But seriously, I do have a point here. Sort of. And even if numbers by themselves may not be intrinsically evil, I definitely think there's something wrong with their paramount importance in this country's educational system. I know, I know, you're all thinking I should have gone to Brown, but well, my hair isn't orange, my body isn't pierced in 37 different places, and where the heck am I going to tan in Providence, huh? Anyway, this problem seems to be most chronic in high schools, so it's there I'll focus my rant.

Between ETS and GPAs and SATs and IQs, it seemed like everyone was trying to quantify human worth and judge your intelligence on the basis of a four-digit number and a decimal point. Instead of Daniel, they might as well have just called me 4.0173. My nickname could have been the cosine of the 10th's digit. Knowledge for the sake of numbers. It didn't matter if the numbers made sense or seemed reasonable; all anyone wanted to know was if something was on the test. And speaking of tests, most of the ones I took were about three hours of work crammed into 43 minutes, which left you no time to think about anything. God forbid your pencil should break because, by the time you fished through your bag and found a new one, everyone else was on page 7. This doesn't measure how much you know, but rather how fast you can scribble.

What's worse is that this sort of system often reserves its highest honors for those stressed out, obsessive folk who go home every day after school, eat Fig Newtons, and do calculus problems for five hours. You know, the kind of people who make flash cards for gym class. I could be wrong, but I don't think education is all about memorization and pop quizzes. We should be trying to produce people who are good at life, not just physics: People who are happy and don't shake in fear like an epileptic guinea pig every time report cards are sent home. Because the truth is, you have to figure out most of the important things in life on your own, for yourself, without all those formulas you loaded into your calculator. All the answers for life aren't going to be found on page 347 of your textbook.

Most of what's important doesn't happen in a classroom, either. This may be good news for those of you who went to three Chem 10C lectures before deciding sleep was a much better idea. OK, so now I have South Campus in a frenzy, and my fellow Earthly Bruins in praise. I should remind all of you, that I am in fact a South Campus student myself, and it is perhaps from here that my rage stems. I cannot fathom a physics test where in addition to a problem set, it might be required of me to write what "$E=MC^2$" actually means. I do, however, acknowledge that this is not the case for all professors. As a matter of fact, on a recent statistics midterm, Professor Don Ylvisaker required that I not only answer a complete statistical problem set, but that I also respond, in paragraph form (a risky proposition for science students), to the validity of a medical study of his choosing. Needless to say, I was impressed.

Here's a thought from a wonderful little book called, "The Tao of Pooh." (I definitely think it should be added to the high school English canon. It

What is Generation X? Who are we? Unlike the Baby Boomers, we are not coming of age during a war or a "great social movement." What will history have to say about Generation X? Hey! You're not the only one with issues

PERSPECTIVES: Everyone's life is rife with problems, so don't pass judgment without a deeper look

You think you've got problems? Capital D Dysfunctional everywhere you look? You're probably right. But you're not the only one blessed with this phenomenon. We are all more dysfunctional than we pretend to be.

Stephanie Pfeffer

Admit it – you're pretty messed up. What's that I see? Pouting? Defensive? Dare to disagree? Come on, don't feel so bad. I find it nice, even somewhat comforting (in a dysfunctional sort of way).

Surely it must suck to feel like you're the only one in the world with a bad situation. But you are never alone. It only seems that way. Our perceptions of each other are inherently flawed, even for those of us who pride ourselves on having a keen intuition. I for one, have always considered myself a sure-shot people reader – I knew people. I knew what they'd do. I knew how they'd feel. I knew. Only recently has it become apparent that I don't. Man, I don't know jack.

Everyday, we pass multitudes of other people, some of whom are classmates, others acquaintances, a few even lucky enough to fall into the category of friends. And we make judgments about them. "Great ... here comes that ... smart girl/obnoxious Greek/star athlete/big dork/(insert your fave stereotype here)." These judgments are based on one-dimensional categories and silly labels. We can't help but limit our perception to one main aspect – the biceps, the brain, the bong.

We view others through a circus-like mirror that distorts and flattens their many experiences into one top cover. We don't see the important stuff. Like sediment layers forming on top of one another over the years, so do our past encounters build up until they make life. (We're just a pile of dirt.)

There's no way to understand someone entirely after viewing only the most shallow facade. Of course, you can see your problems perfectly clear. You're trying to figure out where to go to grad school, whether to stay with your boyfriend/girlfriend, when you should go to Europe, how you're going to pay your rent, whether you should tell your close friend that her man's cheating, how to get that C up to a B, and what to have for dinner. And that's all in the span of an hour.

On top of that, as college students we're coping with the obligatory "issues" that come with the territory. "Issues," the UCLA catch phrase of the year. "Dude, he's got issues." Well surprise! So do you. We're all trying to figure out who we are, what we want, what we're supposed to be, all the while gasping at how fast we're turning into our parents when we never dreamed we would.

Don't forget the huge looming decisions, conflicts, emotional conquests, heart and head battles. We're searching for the strength to do what's right. We're attempting to squash our insecurities and stifle the coward inside of us. We're running from the Karma Police (ode to Radiohead).

Damn issues. And your issues may be apparent – in your face, in your mind, in your heart. But what about the person next to you? What are his or her issues?

Our daily trudges only allow us to judge others as they seem, not as they are. We get only a glimpse of their being. Everyone around you stumbles through their own world of complexity and confusion. Everyone. Life breathes in our teachers, our classmates, facilities management workers, people who sell incense and jewelry on Bruin Walk, those who offer free movie tickets, Student Shopper hander-outers, public school teachers who bring their classes to UCLA, department heads. And we don't really know any of them.

Two weeks ago, an acquaintance and I embarked on a tangent to escape our psych study session. We talked about our lives, how we were so screwed up, how we had so many problems. From men to families to siblings and back, we were straight out of "Who's Who of Dysfunctional College Students." She looked at me in awe, "You seem so well-adjusted, like you've really got it together." Funny, I

Democracy cannot cure all failing world governments

CAPITALISM: Poverty, social ills of other countries shouldn't be directly correlated with communism

By Jacob Lee

Ryan Donlon and Matthew Gever, writers of "U.S. mustn't emulate socialism's spotted record," and "Only capitalism upholds individual rights," respectively, (March 5), clearly adopt overly dogmatic, uncritical and naive arguments in their tirade against communism and socialism. The lack of sophistication in their perspectives and their rude criticisms of Michelle Oberman disappoint me. In order to understand this issue we really have to look at more than "communism" or "capitalism." Undeniably nearly every communist nation in the world has failed or is failing. It is also undeniable that the most powerful and prosperous nations of the world are largely capitalist democracies. However, three often overlooked facts are that these failures are not exclusively linked with communism and socialism, that democracy and capitalism will not necessarily cure the problems of communist and socialist nations, and that all of the world's communist governments were built in conditions adverse to the establishment of a prosperous and free nation.

Gross violations of human rights are not limited to communist/socialist nations. These outrageous violations are not characteristic of communism and socialism; they are characteristic of communities and nations that are impoverished, unstable and usually under the rule of the few. These viola-

LETTERS

True blue

This letter is in response to Mark Shapiro's March 4 article "From a simple rivalry comes an all-out battle of espionage." I've listened all week to "sports fans" disparage and chastise Brett Butler for his comments about Mike Piazza being "a moody, self-centered, '90s player." Now, I realize Mark's article was partly in jest, but the underlying sentiment is obvious. I was never a huge fan of Butler, but as a baseball, and especially, a Dodger fan, I always admired his hustle and commitment to the good of the team. This is something I have never seen in Piazza. Piazza is obviously a great player, but he is no leader. Shapiro says about Butler, that "no one remembers him trying to fill the leadership void that cost the Dodgers dearly down the stretch last year."

Well, the reason there was a void was because none of the obvious leader candidates like Piazza and Eric Karros stepped in to lead the team all year. Meanwhile, Butler did the best he could, and was definitely an inspiration while trying to come back from cancer.

As far as Butler being a "Giant spy" in disguise, Butler is more of a true Dodger than Piazza will ever be. I contend this because, during contract negotiations, Piazza claimed that though he loves Los Angeles, he has no problem leaving to go to another team to receive the money he thinks he deserves. Supposedly, he feels he needs to be the highest paid player in baseball, despite never leading his team to a playoff win, failing to win the MVP twice due to a September collapse in performance, and generally being unappreciative of the huge fan support he receives. How can you respect a player that does not respect the fans who love him? He is moody and self-centered and definitely an archetypal '90s player.

The reason Butler chose now to state this obvious fact is because last year it would have hurt the team, and hopefully this year, it will force some team unity leading to team chemistry that Piazza cannot instigate himself. If anything, Butler is a true Dodger, and represents more of the loyalty and reverence for the game than any selfish player like Piazza can ever hope to realize once existed in baseball.

tions occur in capitalist, communist, democratic and dictatorial societies. Brazil, for example, is a democratic capitalist nation. However, democracy and capitalism have not brought the "American dream" to the miserable multitudes in Brazil. In fact, capitalism and industries such as sugar cane are important causes of this misery. It becomes obvious that communism and socialism probably are not the direct cause of the loss of freedom and meager standard of living.

Eastern Europe has become the testing ground for U.S. claims of the democratic-capitalist wonder drug. The painful truth is that not only is the transition to democracy and capitalism a painful and difficult process, but that the demo-capitalist system proposed does not fit all Eastern-European societies and cultures. Many people in Eastern Europe do not want these changes, nor are all of these changes appropriate for these societies.

Finally, and most importantly, communism and socialism did not necessarily fail because these systems are deficient, but because these systems were superimposed over societies suffering from unbelievable poverty, lack of opportunity or equality, and without traditions of freedom, democracy and capitalism.

Russia and China were largely nations of peasant farmers used to, and routinely subjected to, much suffering. The very conditions, experiences and structures of these societies made it nearly impossible to create fair, prosperous and terror-free states. Unfortunately, it is doubtful that any government would ever have survived without ironhanded, harsh and horrible violations of human rights. Nation building is more than establishing a constitution and government. If these nations had adopted democratic-capitalist systems, it is probable that these systems would have survived.

Therefore, it is clear that communism has rarely, if ever, been tested on an equal footing with our own U.S. democratic/capitalist experiment. It is naive to suppose that communism and socialism led to the loss of liberty from some innate deficiency. It is also apparent that democracy and capitalism are not social wonder drugs. Finally, if we are to understand and really appreciate reality, we must try to look at the world objectively. Donlon and Gever fail miserably.

had thought the same of her. I would've never guessed that her family has serious communication problems and that she only talks to her sister once a year.

And just the other night another friend and I were talking and he was in a bad mood. When I inquired as to why, he said he had "issues" and problems I could never understand. Once he finally started to spill it, he finished with "My life is so fucked." I just sat there in disbelief. I was like, wait, I thought my life was screwed. Then I realized that everyone's life is. We all live with some element of dysfunction and conflicting emotions, freaky relationships and an aura of weirdness.

So why are we fooled when it comes to everyone else? Because people do a great job of playing it cool.

Two weeks ago my professor's mother passed away. Last week, another professor suffered the same fate. We students had no idea, as they stood and lectured about things so theoretical, that the women who cared and nurtured them for God knows how many years of their lives were wasting away. We had no way of knowing that the abstract academic concepts paled in comparison to the concrete painful feelings that I can only assume come with losing a parent. Did we, as students, know this was happening to them? No.

So the next time the woman snaps at you in the library, take two seconds to ponder where she is coming from before copping an attitude. Had she been up all night with a sick child? Filing for a divorce? In serious debt? Husband having an affair? 14-year-old daughter threatening to run away? Doing drugs? All of the above? More? Don't let simplistic generalizations trick you.

Obviously there's no way to know everything about everyone. Just don't fool yourself into thinking you do. Increase your awareness and be sensitive to other people's situations. Their lives are more complicated than you think, almost as complicated as yours. While everything looks smooth and creamy at the surface, jagged crevices lie underneath.

To end with a quote from last week's "Ally McBeal": "I like my life a mess. If it wasn't a mess, it wouldn't be my life."

She's got her set of issues. I've got my issues. You've got yours. Come to think of it, life's just a bunch of issues and tissues.

Energy makes the difference

SHOW: One-hit wonders prove anything but at crowd-pleasing concert

By Michelle Zubiate
Daily Bruin Contributor

One-hit wonders? Maybe. Immature rhythms? Check. Punk kids? Definitely. Boring beats? Going over the list, that would be the one thing missing from Sunset's Palladium last Saturday night.

On the bill were stellar performances by Sugar Ray, Save Ferris and Goldfinger (funk-rock act Incubus also opened) but no shortage of pulsating energy. Call them here-today-and-gone-tomorrow, but you can't call them dull. If anything, their performances would place them in the top most-underestimated-bands category.

Ending a recent tour, these three bands brought it home to Los Angeles for a final show of entertaining vigor.

Goldfinger's punk attitude remained true to the spirit of the evening lineup, but did not grasp the crowd until after a few warm-up numbers. Songs such as "Skiers Must Perish" and "This Lonely Place" created mini-mosh pits and stirred the preteen crowd's jumping instincts a little more with every song. By the end of the set, the audience cheered for Goldfinger's evident talent, if not for their mediocre on-stage ability.

One interesting thing about Goldfinger's performance was the fan base swirling below them. On one side of the stage were sweaty skinny guys with no shirts while the other side had full-suited snazzy hipsters jamming with less of a bad-boy flare.

It was evident, however, that the crowd saved their cool moves and true enthusiasm for a certain long-awaited Orange County ska-band.

Obligingly, Save Ferris gave the crowd their usual dose of swinging ska fun and vitality as lead singer Monique Powell charmed the crowd with her down-to-earth spunk and independent tough-girl persona.

Monique Powell of Save Ferris entertained at the Palladium show.

Every song had the room swinging and dancing to the groovin' tunes. Even songs that don't go so well on the album, such as "Spam," had sudden new life on stage as Powell used it to connect to the crowd through sing-alongs. The band's incredible horn section was just one of the high points of Save Ferris' set.

The newest radio hit, "Goodbye," contains ultra-smooth rhythms that enchanted the crowd with every hip-swaying note. Between guitarist Brian Mashburn's song composing and Powell's energetic dancing on stage, Save Ferris complemented the night's entertainment.

> Monique Powell charmed the crowd with her down-to-earth spunk and independent tough-girl persona.

But the best was yet to come. Since their last performance in Los Angeles at KROQ's Almost Acoustic Xmas, many Angeleno alt-rock fans have been looking forward to the next Sugar Ray live performance, seeing how they put on such dazzling sets. Begging for more, all expectations were met on Saturday by a show above-and-beyond the usual rehashed motions most bands fall into like clockwork.

From the minute lead singer Mark McGrath came on stage, the whole house jumped with excitement, girls squealing with delight when he took off his shirt early in the show. He had the audience captivated by every pose and every lyric. He jumped from speaker to stage and back up to the speaker at times, showing off the right moves for all the women.

Album tracks "RPM" and "Sweet Home California" relinquished every enthusing punk-metal chord of the album, "Floored," which was given a new life by Sugar Ray's thrilling live performance. McGrath himself proved that he was more than just vocals as he rocked the audience with Telling the story of World War II's lesser-known victims, author Nora Okja Keller is pleasantly surprised with the breadth of audience that has responded to her first novel, 'Comfort Woman.'

Nora Okja Keller's first novel, "Comfort Woman," is the story of a woman's experience in Japanese comfort stations.

They were not prostitutes by choice. Instead they were lied to and taken to serve as Japanese soldiers' sexual slaves. These "comfort women" were locked away and their secret has only recently been revealed. The public's knowledge of these World War II victims is still minimal, despite their efforts to tell their stories.

Hearing the horrible confessions of one former comfort woman in 1993 inspired Nora Okja Keller to write "Comfort Woman." Keller will discuss her novel at UCLA's Kerckhoff Art Gallery at 4 p.m. today, revealing her first interaction with a former comfort woman.

"I'd never heard before this part of history that had been silenced for so long," Keller says. "It affected me physically, like someone punched me in the stomach."

Many are unfamiliar with the Japanese comfort stations that housed young girls taken from Korea. The subject has become controversial, as some have tried to deny the stations' existence in order to avoid responsibility – but these women have emerged to tell their stories.

"When I heard the speaker I was so deeply moved," Keller says. "After that I continued to be haunted by her story."

Following the comfort woman's discussion, Keller was motivated to write a short story involving two characters, a mother who is a former comfort woman and her daughter. This first story became chapter two in her novel.

The novel takes shape through the perspectives of both daughter and mother, with narrations relating the mother's suffering from her past experiences that affected her mental state and her relationships with her family.

"It's not just a story about one woman's experience in the camps," Keller says. "It's also about how that woman goes on to live with it."

Many readers assume the story represents reality because there are many similarities between

Looking wild

In their upcoming movie "Wild Things" Neve Campbell, Kevin Bacon, Matt Dillon and Denise Richards are doing some pretty wild things. Fraught with plot twists, the film is full of back-stabbing and surprise. We thought the actors should look the part, so go ahead and dress up these paper dolls as wildly as possible. Outrageous thriller points out absurdities of humankind

FILM: Jazzy 'Wild Things' presents trashy fun that's meant to be laughed at

By Stephanie Sheh
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

Don't let the ads deceive you. "Wild Things" is not a typical thriller. It's outrageous. It's trashy. And if you feel like laughing at its absurdity, go ahead. The cast, gathered at the Century Plaza Hotel, insists that you're supposed to laugh.

"They kind of walk out going, 'Oh my God! I can't believe I liked that movie,'" Kevin Bacon says of the reactions that audiences have had to "Wild Things," which screens tonight at UCLA's Freud Playhouse. Clad in an Emma Peale t-shirt and leather jacket, Bacon not only stars in the film but also serves as executive producer.

He nestles comfortably into a large leather conference chair and then continues, "That's kind of the reaction I got reading the screenplay. I read the first 15 pages and I go, 'God this is really trashy.' And then it sort of went on and took a turn and surprised me and surprised me and surprised me again. By the end I put it down and was like, 'Honey I just read this thing and you're not going to believe that I like this, but I really do.'"

For some reason though, the film is being marketed as a dark thriller or even film noir.

"I don't see this film as noir. And frankly I have a little problem with re-doing noir," Bacon says. "I kind of feel that it was a time period that worked. There (were) some cool movies made, but I don't know if it's really applicable to us anymore. This movie's bright. It's not dark. It's not night. It's jazzy. It's neon. It's like neon-noir. Maybe that's it."

Thanks to Network Event Theater and McIlhenny Co. Tabasco Brand, who are sponsoring the event, tonight Bruins and other college students will get to judge for themselves. Following the free screening at the Freud Playhouse, a question-and-answer session with Bacon and the film's other stars, Matt Dillon and Denise Richards will be broadcast throughout a network of colleges across the nation.

> Richards ... chose to do "Wild Things" because she found her character complex and interesting.

"I'm excited," Richards says of visiting the UCLA campus."I think it'll be fun for us to talk about the film and let them ask what they want."

Bacon, who recognizes that the film is targeted toward a younger audience, says that he nevertheless hopes he will see viewers over 25 at cocktail parties secretly admitting that they saw the film.

"I think that'll be an interesting thing," Bacon says of the event. "I've never actually done that satellite thing before, but they've started to do it now and it seems like a good way to reach out to campuses."

With young stars such as Richards and Neve Campbell in it, the film is sure to draw in at least the young male population.

Relatively new to the acting arena, Richards, who started as a model and was last seen in "Starship Troopers," has been carefully building her career. The actress says that she chose to do "Wild Things" because she found her character complex and interesting.

Richards plays snobbish high schooler Kelly Van Ryan, who accuses her guidance counselor (Dillon) of rape. Richards describes Kelly as manipulative and having no conscience. In a climactic courtroom scene she throws a glass at the head of a classmate (Campbell) who testifies at the trial.

"I was so nervous doing that scene, throwing the glass because I'm a lefty," Richards says excitedly. "And everyone made fun of me because I can't throw. When we rehearsed I threw a plastic bottle of water and it just went everywhere so they built this bulletproof glass over Neve for me to nail the X. I was actually sweating waiting for my cue. I'm like, 'God I'm going to slam somebody in the head.'"

Another of the film's demands that made Richards nervous was performing a love scene. Richards, who had never done nudity before, (she was one of the few who remained clothed in "Starship Troopers," although more skin was originally written into the script) says that she felt that her character and the plot called for her to unrobe.

"We had to be very professional," recalls Campbell, who helped put her co-star at ease about the film's notorious threesome scene. "It was about us sitting down and saying, 'What are you comfortable with? What are you not comfortable with? What are all our boundaries?' So I gave her a bottle of wine and some margaritas and we were okay."

"Those scenes are always difficult because you take actors in a room with a crew and reduce the crew as far as you possibly can," McNaughton explains. "But you're taking off your clothes and you're pretending to have sex in front of technicians who are wearing combat boots and cut offs and t-shirts and it couldn't be more unnatural and uncomfortable."

Richards attributes her comfort and ability to do the scene to both Campbell and McNaughton, who is from the south side of Boston.

"A lot of my friends there have nothing to do with this business," McNaughton, says twiddling his thumbs. "So they go, 'Oh you got to do the nude scene with the girls. Oh that must be really special.' It's like,

Monkeys fail to catch crowd's attention

MUSIC: Rushing through set prevents band from making any real impact

By Mike Prevatt
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

British popsters the Space Monkeys stopped by the Troubadour on Friday in support of their exciting debut album, "The Daddy of Them All." Unfortunately, the Monkeys didn't bring the excitement with them.

Armed with two turntables, synthesizers, a clear and loud P.A. system and a strobe-heavy lighting set-up, the Space Monkeys moseyed on over to the Troubadour stage a little past 11 p.m., ready for battle. Almost half of the sold-out crowd had left along with standout opening band Ivy, leaving holes and gaps among the twenty-somethings in front of the stage and hovering near the bar. But with an arsenal of material like that featured on their record, the remaining fans waited eagerly in anticipation for a good time.

The Space Monkeys put a new spin on the "Madchester" sound that was once popular in the U.K. during the early '90s. Originating from the city of Manchester, this rhythmic and danceable approach to rock 'n' roll flourished in Europe and in American clubs with the help of such acclaimed bands as the Stone Roses, Primal Scream and the Happy Mondays. Catchy melodies and Beatles-esque songwriting teamed up with acid house rhythms and synthesized loops, helping to popularize the rave scene that revolutionized music in Britain.

The Manchester-bred Space Monkeys pick up where bands like the Happy Mondays left off, taking the bouncy, happy beats and combining them with Oasis-like rock melodies and blaring electronic sounds not too much unlike Prodigy's. Here in America, success has gone as far as a Top-20 single, "Sugar Cane," on Billboard's Modern Rock Charts. They've even toured with the likes of fellow Interscope recording group Smashmouth and alt-rock darlings Third Eye Blind.

Friday night's 50-minute set begin with the aggressive yet pulsating "Acid House Killed Rock and Roll," which bathed both the band and the concertgoers in a shower of strobe lights. Yet the crowd seemed unenthusiastic, both by their slight head-bobs

Great performances make Jonson's 'Volpone' sparkle

THEATER: Quick pace may overcome audience but humor gets through

By Michael Gillette
Daily Bruin Contributor

If Ben Jonson's Volpone isn't the nastiest rogue to ever command the stage, he's certainly the most actively greedy character to ever win an audience's sympathy.

When we meet Volpone, he's in the midst of carrying out one of the oddest plans in all of world literature. In a scheme to win his neighbor's riches, he spreads the rumor that he's dying and plays ill on his couch while his knave Mosca receives the town's gentlemen. These gentlemen bring Volpone favors, such as bags of gold and giant diamonds in the hope that unmarried, childless Volpone will make them his sole heir.

This plan wins us over for two reasons. First, while Volpone in his planning is low and deceptive, the plans of the gentlemen he's duping are even more low and deceptive. Second, and more important, Volpone's plan involves a performance, just like that of Richard III. And as Shakespeare and Jonson knew, performances are why we go to the theater.

The people at the Noise Within theater in Glendale, where "Volpone" is playing through May 17, know this as well. Not only do they have Volpone's couch at center stage, where every one of actor Dan Kern's fiendish reactions to the goings-on can be seen, but they have an audience of actors dressed as crows perched above the stage, squawking at the appropriate times and making sound effects to punctuate the play's action.

This touch is typical of director Art Manke's production, in which wit and speed are not in short supply. This style places tremendous trust in the cast, who are expected not only to carry off a dense Elizabethan text at a fast clip, but to infuse it with an energy that competes with endless rollicking set chases and amusing side diversions as well.

That the production succeeds is testament both to the superb pool of acting talent in the Noise Within's company, and to the generous, free-wheeling nature of Jonson's text. Like his contemporary, Shakespeare, Jonson created spacious plays filled with creative invention and possessing a wonderful elasticity, so that when the grotesque English knight Sir Politic Would Be, around whom the play's sub-plot revolves, pulls out a giant imitation tortoise shell to hide

'You don't know what hell it is. It's the most uncomfortable thing.'

"Mostly, people are uncomfortable with it and you set your schedule and that day has a sort of little red flag on it," McNaughton continues. "When you get closer to it the tension starts to build."

No matter how difficult, the love scene was essential in conveying the outrageousness and absurdity of the film, which McNaughton feels is true of all crime stories.

"One of the most fascinating things about true crime is how stupid most criminal plots are," McNaughton laughs. "I had more than one set of friends actually that robbed banks. And they were all in jail before the sun went down. And I think they sat around and thought they were really going to rob a bank and have all this money."

Coming from the director of "Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer," perhaps it's not surprising that he finds crime humorous. He says that one of his favorite examples of the absurdity of criminal plots was the Nancy Kerrigan and Tonya Harding fiasco.

"You look at those people. They sat around and hatched a plot. 'Okay, now Nancy's going to come by and there will be three thousand camera crews out there. Now you. You run out there with this iron pipe and hit her on the leg. Then we'll win the gold medal at the Olympics.' It's just like, 'What were they thinking?' And it's a shame that she got beat in the leg with the pipe, but there's a great deal of humor in the insanity of human behavior, especially criminal plotting, how short-sighted it is. Bad behavior is endlessly amusing to me."

McNaughton's actors also understand how he finds these things amusing.

"He's got a great demented sense of humor," Dillon says. "He doesn't let on right away, but it's always there."

Richards agrees, "He's got a little dark side which was good for the film. He likes to shock people."

And the director embraces Richards' statement about his interest in shock value, "Yeah let's shake people up. Who wants to sit there and be lulled into complacency?"

With his slightly warped sense of humor, it seems that McNaughton is the perfect director for bringing out the absurdity in "Wild Things."

"One of the great things about John McNaughton is that although he really pushes the envelope and pushes extremes and makes people uncomfortable in this movie, that's what they're about," Campbell explains. "They're about the absurdity of life. They're about the absurdity of human kind and we should be able to laugh at that and sometimes some people may be uncomfortable laughing at that, but it's okay to do it."

FILM: The NET free screening of "Wild Things" and question-and-answer session will start tonight in the Freud Playhouse at 6 p.m. and their rather quiet applause. It seemed as if the crowd was hearing the Space Monkeys for the first time, and were at the most curious.

Furthermore, within two or three songs, the Monkeys had begun to turn their set list into a rushed live version of the album. Right on the tail of one song's end was the beginning of another, as the band seemed hurried and eager just to finish every song as quickly as possible. Most of the songs didn't have the typical trailing-off effect at the end, creating at least a few quiet spots in the show.

That didn't mean the show was without its bright spots, musically speaking. An earnest version of the Britpop-ish "Inside My Soul," a hook-laden go at "Burning Down the Stylus" and of course the obligatory "Sugar Cane" indeed highlighted the rushed set list, even if they weren't quite as ear-grabbing or lively as the album versions.

> The band left and never returned, leaving the ... crowd to mull over a night that failed to grab much of anyone.

And lead singer Richard McNevin even managed a few sentences here and there between songs. The problem lay in his thick Manchester accent, with the crowd often looking around as if the person next to them might be able to translate the perhaps less-obvious words. His vocal delivery lacked any real range or character, just barely capturing the essence of the melodies.

Bassist Dom Morrison kept the rhythms flowing but sometimes it seemed to drown out McNevin's guitar and vocals. On target, though, was DJ and keyboardist Tony Pipes, mastering the turntables during such songs like "Sugar Cane," even setting one on fire towards the end.

The band also played album cuts like "Ready For the Rampage" and "Sweetest Dream." Yet by the time the last song, "March of the Scarecrows," had begun, many of the members of the audience had left and the rest seemed ready to go home. After 'Scarecrows,' the band left and never returned, leaving the departing crowd to mull over a night that failed to really grab much of anyone.

VOLPONE

beneath when imperiled, the gesture seems not at all out of place, as it might in a drama by Jean Racine.

At the center of Manke's production are two outstanding performances. As Volpone, Dan Kern shines both in the early faux-invalid scenes, where in a single scene he creates the necessary conspiracy between the actor and audience on which the play hinges, and in disguise about town, where he summons a volcanic charisma that takes the audience by surprise.

The second comes from Francois Giroday in the role of Mosca, Volpone's knave. Giroday puts an entire arsenal of acting tricks – gestures, voices, expressions – to sinister use, and the effect is dazzling. The payoff, of course, comes at the end, when the self-proclaimed parasite bears his teeth.

If there is any complaint to be voiced about the show, it's that it goes so fast at times that it leaves the audience behind. The production certainly does not fail to bring this classic work to life; the superb Noise Within company never has a problem with that, but here one feels that the wonderful sense of connection normally shared by the performers and the audience at their show is missing, and that it's the performers who are having all the fun.

THEATER: "Volpone" by Ben Jonson runs through May 17 at A Noise Within, 234 South Brand Blvd., Glendale. Tickets are $22 to $27 general, $18 to $22 students. Call (818) 546-1924.

Beccah, the daughter, and Keller. Their ages are identical and as an adult, Beccah is a writer for the "Star Bulletin," an occupation once held by Keller.

Despite these details taken from Keller's life, she reminds readers that the novel is fictitious and not all scenes are true to life. "The characters that I wrote about, the affair that (Beccah) had with the editor was all fiction," Keller laughs. And "my mom's not a comfort woman. She's alive and well."

> "(I tried) to write a story as honestly as I could from the hearts of these two characters."
> Nora Okja Keller
> Author

Although Keller expected her readership after publication to be composed primarily of females and Asian Americans, she found it to be much more diverse.

"I found that when I was going to the different bookstores and universities that there were quite a lot of men in the audience as well," Keller says. "That kind of surprised me."

Likewise, the audience's feedback was also far from homogenous.

"Some people said that it was so profound and they were deeply touched," Keller says. "But one woman who was a born-again Christian said that she was very offended by the novel."

Whatever her audiences' reactions were, "Comfort Woman" has accomplished more than Keller ever intended. Aside from telling a touching story, Keller has educated readers on this hidden component of World War II history. Currently, "Comfort Woman" is being taught in university Asian American history and women's literature classes.

"I didn't have any kind of big noble objective," Keller says. "It was just to write a story as honestly as I could from the hearts of these two characters."

"Comfort Woman" is Keller's first novel, written in her own style, which incorporates complex time shifts. Keller developed her style reading other authors whose styles she respected.

"I started reading people who spoke directly to me," Keller says. "It felt like the types of writing they did were the kinds of writing that I wanted to do."

Others are impressed with her style's refinement at such a young age.

"She really tapped into a fluid lyricism with 'Comfort Woman,'" says Louis Yamanaka, author of "Wild Meat." "There's a kind of elevation of the story into poetry."

Keller credits her novel's completion to the motivation she had while participating in a writing group. The group offered her support, and her own comfort.

"I thought at one point if it never does get published, at least I have this group of people who will read it," Keller says.

> "(Keller) really tapped into a fluid lyricism with 'Comfort Woman,'"
> Louis Yamanaka
> Author

Keller wrote 'Comfort Woman' in two-and-a-half years, creating a literary piece with the potential of becoming a bestseller. She is currently working on her second novel and plans to finish it within the next two years. Though Keller claims to have chanced upon her book's success, Keller's bit of advice for successful writing is simply to read and write abundantly.

"I just saw in this magazine ... it's like, 'How to Become A Best Selling Author,'" Keller says. "I went, 'What?' It was so funny that there were actual steps to this."

BOOK: Author Nora Keller will be discussing and signing her first novel, "Comfort Woman," in Kerckhoff Art Gallery today at 4 p.m.

a smashing guitar solo, blowing away everyone in the room.

The set was not only a compilation of straightforward tunes. It had its moments of fun as well. A portion of the show involved Sugar Ray creating a mock candlelight dinner on stage while McGrath crooned a Barry Manilow-esque ballad to the amusement of the audience. Playing it up, the band yelled to each other, "What the hell are we doing? Bad Religion would never do this!" Another highlight included a great danceable mix given by Craig "DJ Homicide" Bullock and his turntables.

Of course, how would the set be complete without the KROQ and now KIIS-FM staple "Fly"? Unlike most of their punk songs, the ska beat of "Fly" satisfied and delighted all the kids.

Unfortunately, the long set gave way to those lovable late-night freaks. With only minutes left in the show, two crowd-surfing females flashed the crowd to the amusement of all the boys in the audience. The girls got equal enjoyment out of streaking boys running around the perimeter of the floor.

Every song kept up the same stamina, from the hyper-spirit of "Cash" to the crunchin' chords of "Anyone." Sugar Ray proved that they are a band of talent, capable of pulling off a great performance.

The crowd reacts enthusiastically to Sugar Ray's performance.

*51 This letter is a testimony of my benefits from Beverly Hills Acne-Skin Care Clinic. I had never had previous severe acne problems until my 1st year in college. It was a very depressing situation and seemed to be getting progressively worse. I can still remember how painful the skin condition was-both physically and emotionally.
There was hope I realized when I came to BM Acne-Skin Care Clinic. Mary had much expertise and she knew how I was feeling. Even better, she knew how to relieve me of my problem. After, my skin began to clear up. What a wonderful feeling it was to know that my condition could be solved! I highly recommend anyone who has acne problems to this clinic. It really works!

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make your ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

The ASUCLA Communications board fully supports the University of California's policy on nondiscrimination. No medium shall accept advertisements which present persons of any origin, race, sex, or sexual orientation in a demeaning way or imply that they are limited to positions, capabilities, roles, or status in society. Neither the Daily Bruin nor the ASUCLA Communications Board has investigated any of the services advertised or the advertisements represented in this issue. Any person believing that an advertisement in this issue violated the Board's policy on nondiscrimination stated herein should communicate complaints in writing to the Business Manager, Daily Bruin, 118 Kerckhoff Hall, 308 Westwood Plaza, Los Angeles, CA 90024. For assistance with housing discrimination problems, call the UCLA Housing Office at (310) 825-4271 or call the Westside Fair Housing Office at (310) 475-9671. Classified ads also appear on-line at http://www.dailybruin.ucla.edu. Placement on-line is offered as a complimentary service for customers and is not guaranteed. The Daily Bruin is responsible for the first incorrect ad insertion only. Minor typographical errors are not eligible for refunds. For any refund, the Daily Bruin Classified Department must be notified of an error on the first day of publication by noon.

Good Head!

See Dick. See Dick's cap. Recent studies show MOST UCLA students drink no more than 4 when they party. So what? Students who drink 4 or less have better love lives, are happier with their relationships, and have "Good Heads". Good thinkin' Dick!

Meet Dick. No he's not on the swim team, and that's not a dunce cap. Actually Dick is a 4.0 student with a good head on his shoulders. Even though Dick has been engaged in some social intercourse, a couple of beers, a shot and a blow job, he has not lost his head and forgotten his headiness. And if you can't tell by this photo, this particular headgear is quite a head shrinker. O.K. so he never quite learned what bone is connected to what, but he deserves an "A" for effort! After all he's head over heels for the head cheerleader, his head phones are blown, and he's trying to head off the head master (who incidentally got a good head start!). The pressures of this head strong young man have not caused him to charge head first into a heady drink-a-thon. No, not this Dick. He knows over doing it would only cause him a huge headache and a trip straight to the head for a wrestling match with the toilet. (And nobody likes to be in a toilet's headlock.) Why - if he were to head up a real booze fest, his new head quarters might just be located six feet under a headstone! Heads up! Most UCLA students drink four or less when they party. Some don't drink at all. So use your head and remember, when you've done 4, you're done.

1300 Campus Employment

Freightliner Corporation is the North American market leader in the design, development and manufacture of a complete line of technologically-advanced trucks.

Sales Applications Engineers

If you are a recent college graduate or are in the last year of your mechanical or manufacturing degree program, you may be eligible for our training program for Sales Applications Engineers at our Portland, Oregon Headquarters. In this program, we will teach you how to assist and consult with customers, dealers, and field staff on specific applications and models. You will also inspect designated TSO's for engineering feasibility and provide technical feedback to field sales staff. We are looking for energetic, outgoing individuals who excel at customer service and have a talent for problem solving and troubleshooting.

We are coming to the UCLA campus Friday, March 13th, at the Engineering Placement office from 9:15am-5:00pm. Stop by and see us. You can also fax your resume in advance to: (503) 735-5299. In addition to an excellent work environment, Freightliner offers a competitive compensation and benefits package. We are an equal opportunity employer. M/F/D/V.

Next year you could be publishing paper for a Goliath.

We're hiring Davids.

Public Interest Career Positions

The Goliaths of today are polluting our environment, cheating their customers and corrupting the democratic process. If you would rather be a David than push paper for a Goliath, apply for a position with the state PIRGs, the State Public Interest Research Groups. We were started by Ralph Nader and we stand up for the public interest.

We're hiring full-time professional staff to help us organize, research, lobby and wage grassroots campaigns for the public interest.

why run all over the place when you have free access to apartment listings here on campus? looking for a place to live can be a real drag, and it's not like you've got all the time in the world. so who wants to drive around with their head out the window trying to read the type on those tiny "FOR RENT* signs? how are you supposed to know what apartment will cost in Santa Monica or Brentwood or Palms? and is it close to the bus? wouldn't it be great if there was an office on campus that kept track of all that stuff for you? maybe this is your lucky day because all that and housing does more. you can look at apartment listings, or maybe you want to share a house with a couple friends. find a roommate on-line even. you know you have free access to all this as a ucla student. you can even post listings for free or pick up some bus schedules. just give us a call at 825-4491. it wouldn't be a bad idea to get some info on how to get all of your security deposit back either since the only thing you need more than extra time, is extra money.....

The first time I saw this, I thought that maybe Ozzy had put in a guest appearance with the committee, because someone involved has a really sick sense of humor.

We pulled arguably the hottest team in the country in the second round (Michigan), which has won six straight games, all by more than 17 points, including the inaugural Big Ten Tournament.

They have a guy who is the size of the Bruin Bear in Westwood Plaza, and who is nicknamed after a piece of heavy machinery. Just what our front line needs.

Oh yeah, they're also the best three-point shooting team in the Big Ten.

Should we get past the sequel to "Maximum Overdrive" (that old movie where machines run amok), our sturdy team faces the likes of Kentucky and Duke before they even sniff the Final Four.

Are you absolutely kidding me right now?!

Yeah, it's nice that we're in the tournament and all that, but, for the love of Pedro, this is just nuts!

> (Michigan has) a guy who is the size of the Bruin Bear in Westwood Plaza. Just what our front line needs.

But wait, there's more, because the tournament committee hasn't had a chance to rub salt in the wound yet.

Shift your gaze over to the West Region, if you will, and tell me what you see.

Here's what I behold: top seeded Arizona with a bracket that's easier than Pamela Lee on a cruise.

It's not enough that they beat us on our home floor and broke our string of Pac-10 championships. No, leave it up to the tournament committee to provide the final irony.

While the Bruins break their backs against the best in the nation, the Cats' future holds teams like Tennessee, Utah and Cincinnati, not exactly tournament-tested powers.

If the Wildcats don't make the Final Four with that red carpet treatment, head coach Lute Olson should be forced to issue a formal apology to the entire country, wherein he'll admit he's a terrible coach and promise never to go to the Big Dance again.

So, instead of worrying about school or finals, sit down with your bracket and pencil, because the madness has already begun, and we've got some catching up to do.

MARTIN

play some more basketball and, upon arrival back in the United States, went straight into conditioning for this collegiate season.

So it was this continual pounding – with no breaks in between to rest – that has resulted in two degenerated discs in her lower back.

Martin relates the pain to the aches and pains one gets from the flu.

"But sometimes it will go down the back of my legs, and that's like shooting pains," Martin said. "Almost like needles. When it hurts real bad, it's like when you get a hard muscle cramp."

Martin says that the pain from her back has gotten gradually worse during the season.

"I know at Stanford I took a lot of hard hits," Martin said. "I took one where I was bent backwards. I was playing defense at the time and they just ran right smack into me. I think that's what really started hurting (my back) again because it was getting better for a while. It's gotten gradually worse the last couple of weeks."

The pain has gotten so bad in recent weeks that Martin has decided to forgo playing for the U.S. Junior Championship team and conditioning with the team this summer. Instead, this off-season she will strengthen her back in the weight room and get plenty of rest so she will be at 100 percent for next season.

Although the pain has been eased by the fact that she is scoring 20 points, grabbing 8 boards a game and her team has been red hot, Martin has had to work for every basket and rebound. Her back pain has been frustrating because it has stopped her from doing simple things both on and off of the basketball court that she has normally been able to do with ease.

"Its really frustrating," Martin said. "It's not like an elbow or a thumb injury where I can baby it. It's my back. Everything I do hurts it. When I post up their arm is right there on where it hurts. It's really frustrating because I don't have a lot of strength in it either.

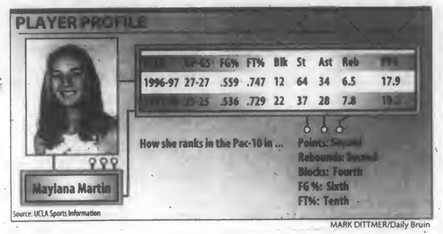
"So shots I would normally make or stuff I would have normally been able to do easily, I can't do now as easy as before my injury. Now I have to work a lot harder."

Olivier says Martin's back injury has hurt Martin's transition game the most.

"I think running the floor was one of her strengths as a freshman because she ran the floor better than anyone I've ever seen as a post player," Olivier said, who played with such Hall of Fame post players as Denise Curry and has coached greats like Natalie Williams. "This year I think she runs the floor very well but not like she did as a freshman."

So how in the world has Martin been able to not only be at the top of the Pac-10 in scoring and rebounding, but also to improve her numbers from last year – numbers which earned her Pac-10 Freshman of the Year honors – with a sore back that has plagued her the entire year?

"Erica (Gomez) is a huge part of that," Martin said about her increased statistics. "Having a true point guard makes a big difference, because last year Tawana (Grimes) was playing out of position at the point. This year, Erica likes to run the floor as a point guard and give it up in transition. When I'm out there I usually get it from Erica if I'm open. I think that gives me a couple of more buckets a game."



MARK DITTMER/Daily Bruin

Martin also attributes her great numbers despite her pain to the fact that she has been mentally playing like she is not hurt.

"If I show that I'm hurt then subconsciously I'll feel more hurt," Martin said. "Like when you tell a little kid, 'You're not hurt, you're not hurt' after they fall down then they don't cry. So I think if I tell myself 'You're not hurt,' I can play and just suck it up."

Martin has tried to hide her injury from her other teammates so they won't worry about her during the game. But despite Martin's efforts, other players on the team have seen what she has to go through each and every game.

"You can see it, she doesn't have to tell us," Hubbard said. "Like in the SC game two weeks ago, she went up for a shot and she came down and fell right on her back. You can just see it on her face that she was in a lot of pain. Also when they try to double team her and the person behind is constantly hitting her from behind you can see it on her face then that she is in a lot of pain.

"Most of the time she plays through it," Hubbard continued. "She never looks at Kathy (Olivier) and says 'I'm in pain, take me out.' She doesn't really complain, she just plays through it."

Olivier feels Martin has been able to be in the top three in scoring and rebounding in the Pac-10 despite her injury because the coaching staff has held Martin out of many practices this season, allowing her to rest her back.

But where would the Bruins be if Martin wasn't able to suck up the pain and had sat out much of the year?

"Oh man, that is something I don't even want to think about," Olivier said, whose Bruins finished in third place in the Pac-10, and have been recently selected for the tournament largely because of the play of Martin.

"Just because she has always been there for us. She's obviously our go-to person right now. And someone people look for for leadership. I couldn't even think about life without Maylana. I think we could survive because we are a very deep team but I don't think we could be doing the same things we are doing now."

Case in point: the Jan. 10 game against Oregon on MacArther Court.

With the game tied at 72 at the two-minute mark and the crowd in a frenzy, Martin wanted the ball. Martin would go on to score four straight baskets carrying her team on that sore back of hers to a 80-75 victory over the Ducks.

"She made herself available. And she literally put the team on her back and said 'C'mon.' We couldn't have won that game without Maylana, that's for sure."

Teammates agree that the UCLA women's basketball team would be a different ball club without the presence of Martin.

"It would be weird not to have her on the court," Hubbard said. "Not to have her presence, not to have her rebounding, not to have her scoring, and not to have her leadership."

Oliver would go on to pay Martin the best compliment that Martin could ever receive.

"I think she will be up with the best of them to ever play at UCLA," Oliver said. "With Denise Curry, Ann Meyers and Natalie Williams. By her senior year she will definitely be in that class.

"She's one of the best I've seen. She's so agile for a post player and she's so athletic for a 6'3" girl. There's not a lot that Maylana Martin can't do."

Including playing with an injury.

Playing successfully with an injury definitely sets Martin apart from the rest. For her not to complain about it, however, and instead suck it up for her team shows a lot of character.

"It takes a special person to play through pain and at the same time not let people know about it," Hubbard said.

"I mean, to go play through the pain that she's in and not to show any signs that you are in pain ... That shows someone that's a real strong person."

BASEBALL BRIEFS

Injury update

Senior righthander John Phillips (0-1, 11.25) missed his scheduled start against Arizona State on Friday due to a quadricep pull suffered in practice on Thursday.

"John comes into the office on Friday at 3:45 so I could talk with him about the game that night," head coach Gary Adams said. "Then he tells me that his quad tightened up overnight ... I never did tell him what I called him in for."

Junior righthander Dan Keller is out of action until at least mid-March with a shoulder injury.

Senior second baseman Nick Theodorou (3 games, .500 batting average) could return to action as soon as this weekend against Arizona. He has been sidelined by a hamstring pull since the series at Berkeley in mid-February.

Sophomore lefthander Rob Henkel (1-3, 8.72 ERA) will undergo season-ending elbow surgery this morning at the Jobe clinic near LAX. The head doctor during the operation is Dr. Yocum, who also handles cases for the Anaheim Angels.

Because he will be out for the remainder of the year, Henkel is redshirting.

Byrnes' skid over?

Senior centerfielder Eric Byrnes went 2-for-5 in Sunday's 9-3 loss to Arizona State. Byrnes was in the longest hitting slump of his career before that two-double performance.

"I hit them hard all five times, but only two of them fell," Byrnes said. "That's good though."

After 14 games, Byrnes was batting .361 (22 for 61). In the seven games to follow, he only managed one hit (1 for 26). His batting average dropped from .361 to the current .272 as a result of this slide.

"He kind of came out of his slump today," Adams said after the game.

Musical chairs

Adams scrambled Sunday's lineup, moving Byrnes into the leadoff spot and dropping former leadoff guy Jack Santora into the ninth spot, in the most noticeable move.

"There were a couple of guys who weren't doing well where they were," Adam said.

Adams commented on his decision to place Byrnes in the No. 1 slot:

"Frankly, I'd like to see him there more often. He's looser in that spot because he doesn't have the weight of the team on his shoulders, like when he's batting cleanup. He's not going to hit fourth in the big leagues. Let him learn to be a leadoff man."

Pitching improves

Six of the seven pitchers who saw action in the Arizona State series are freshmen, and they are showing signs of improvement.

"I think our pitching is coming around," Adams said following Sunday's game.

On lefthander Ryan Carter (1-0, 2.78), who pitched seven solid innings in Friday's 6-5 win, Adams said: "Carter had a great game on Friday. We were looking for a game like that."

On righthander Chad Cislak (2-4, 7.27), who took the loss on Saturday, Adams said: "Cislak is making progress. Good things are happening, but they don't show on the scoreboard."

On righthander Jon Brandt (1-3, 8.10), Sunday's starter, Adams said: "He had a good game today. If you take back that fat pitch he made to Jeff Phelps in the sixth inning (for a homerun), Brandt could've gone for eight innings."

years, they were more concerned that No. 1 Tennessee wasn't put in their regional.

"We were all just screaming and jumping about not getting Tennessee (in our bracket)," senior Tawana Grimes said.

Instead of Tennessee (33-0) the Bruins drew the Wolverines, who similarly have had a long stretch of not being invited to the Big Dance – they were last selected for the field of 64 in the 1989-1990 season.

UCLA head coach Kathy Olivier, who has nine sophomores on her team, feels the tournament bid will begin a long streak of Big Dance selections for the program.

"We feel (the program) is back and that we have arrived for good," Olivier said.

The Bruins will enter the tournament as one of the hottest teams in the nation. They has won 15 of their last 18 games and five of their last six.

experience for the ones who made it through that year."

Now more experienced and bonded, these seniors give back to the freshman diving community what they received from their upperclassmen.

"When I came out here, I was like a wide-eyed little fish in a big pond," Huelskamp recalls. "My teammates were excellent divers and it was neat to work with them and be motivated. By the end of that year, I was able to dive well.

"I know it helped me when I was a freshman to have the upperclassmen take care of me. I see a lot of potential in all of this year's freshmen and they don't see it sometimes. So I try to push and motivate them."

Although this will be the seniors' last year of NCAA eligibility, Huelskamp will continue diving and train to compete in the nationals. Since she's still learning and improving in the sport, she finds it stimulating and beneficial. Yeah, she still loves it.

"I see it's all coming to an end. In sports and in life, things fly by so fast."
Tracy Wilcox
UCLA diver

"My experience at UCLA has not only let me grow as an athlete but also as a person," Huelskamp said. "I learned how to motivate myself and try to be the best I can be. Being in a sport here has allowed me to see what I can do and that hard work can pay off. It's hard work but it's worth it."

On the other hand, Wilcox will retire from diving after giving it her all to compete in the NCAA. Before settling down to her civil environmental engineering career, she anticipates doing things she hasn't done because of her time commitment as a diver, like studying abroad, joining the Peace Corps, and even simple weekend activities such as snowboarding.

As excited as Wilcox is about her life after diving, she is aware that the sport she's been doing since the age of nine is still her priority, at least for the next few weeks.

"I'm a senior and I'm looking at only a few more weeks of competing in this sport I've been doing for 12 years," Wilcox said. "I see it's all coming to an end. In sports and in life, things fly by so fast. I realize it's really important to do the best you can with every moment you have."

CALIFORNIA SPORTS

Warriors 93, Kings 88

In a season where practically everything has gone wrong, perhaps the Golden State Warriors can still salvage something.

The Warriors squandered a huge first-half lead Monday night, but scored the game's final seven points from the free-throw line to defeat the Sacramento Kings 93-88.

It was the fourth win in 10 games since the Warriors began playing their current starting lineup. The addition of Jimmy Jackson and Clarence Weatherspoon, acquired in a trade with Philadelphia, has definitely helped.

"I think it feels real comfortable for us right now," said Jackson, one of four Warriors players in double figures with 17 points. "We're playing very unselfish. Everyone is getting their shots."

Suns 134, Clippers 105

The most suspenseful thing about the fourth quarter of the Phoenix Suns' 134-105 rout of the Los Angeles Clippers was whether any records would fall.

Reserves finished up, and only one was set – Eric Piatkowski made seven 3-pointers, a Clippers franchise high.

The Suns were happy just to have everyone get some action. Nine of 10 players who suited up Monday night scored in double figures against the NBA's worst defense.

"When you're not getting a lot of minutes, you want to come out and get off to a quick start, and that's what I did tonight," said George McCloud, who had 18 of his season-high 21 points in the second quarter.

Kevin Johnson had 19 points, and Jason Kidd had 12 points and 13 assists as Phoenix matched last season's victory total (40) with 21 games remaining.

Kings 4, Ducks 3, OT

Dan Bylsma had as much to do with the Los Angeles Kings' overtime goal as Yanic Perreault, who got the game-winner. And Bylsma wasn't even on the ice at the time.

After referee Kerry Fraser sent Anaheim defenseman Jason Marshall off for high-sticking Bylsma, Perreault tipped in Mattias Norstrom's wrist shot on a power play with 42 seconds remaining for a 4-3 victory over the Mighty Ducks on Monday night.

"We needed that big power play, but the guy who drew that penalty was Dan Bylsma," Kings captain Rob Blake said. "He played a hard game all night, hitting and hitting. He hits someone and gets a stick back, but he doesn't retaliate. He skates away and draws a penalty to win the game for us. Those guys go unnoticed, but those are the guys who are winning games for us."

Sharks 3, Maple Leafs 2

Shawn Burr and Patrick Marleau scored in a 1:42 span midway through the third period to lead San Jose to a 3-2 victory over the Toronto Maple Leafs on Monday night, the Sharks' third straight.

Todd Gill added an empty-net goal for the Sharks with 37 seconds left on a shot from behind his own net that caromed off the boards and into the Toronto net.

Mike Vernon stopped 20 of 22 shots for the Sharks, including a breakaway by Darby Hendrickson with the game tied 1-1 in the third period.

Todd Warriner and Jamie Macoun scored for the Maple Leafs, who were unbeaten in their previous seven games against the Sharks. It was Toronto's first loss to the Sharks since February 1996.

Bruins continue dominating ways with impressive series of victories

W. WATER POLO: Team says aloha to Michigan, UCSB and Hawaii to go undefeated in tournament

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Staff

Water polo has never been this fun.

Last Thursday, the UCLA women's water polo team practically told the Trojans to sit down and stay down, dominating the game 10-1 in Southern Cal's home territory.

Simply put in the words of UCLA head coach Guy Baker, "We were just better."

After crushing the Trojan spirit, the Bruins flew to Hawaii to stir some trouble in paradise. They put a new spin on the traditional Hawaiian greeting "aloha" at the University of Hawaii Tournament this weekend as they brought with them a tropical storm of yellow balls.

> "We elevated our play there in (the Hawaii) game."
> Guy Baker
> Women's water polo head coach

The Bruins were all business in the Friday matchup against Michigan. The best women's water polo team in the Midwest didn't quite stand up to one of the best teams in the nation, as UCLA beat Michigan 15-5. Saturday morning's game against UCSB was a similar story. The Bruins took the win, 10-3.

The final game Saturday night against host Hawaii was the most exciting. After losing to UCLA several weeks ago, Hawaii was determined to redeem itself in its home pool. The home crowd of several hundred was all worked up as the Rainbow Wahine scored the first goal.

After that, Hawaii may have been too gracious of a host to underestimate the Bruins. The UCLA women turned the game around quickly enough to finish 13-6.

By the end of the first quarter, the Bruins took advantage of the tropical hospitality, leading 3-1. They increased the lead to 6-2 by the half. Then came explosive play by the Bruins, where they scored three goals within two minutes.

Boom, boom, boom. Junior Coralie Simmons put two in, while junior Catherine von Schwarz, back in action after a minor practice-related injury, scored another.

"Coralie played one of the best games I've seen a collegiate water polo player play," said UCLA assistant coach Adam Krikorian. "She was all over the place offensively and defensively. Everything she needed to do to as a team player, she made it happen."

"The other player who played well was Mandy McAloon," Baker added. "She guarded one of Hawaii's best players, Marie-Luc Arpin, and shut her out. Arpin starts on the Canadian national team, and she's a very fast player and good shooter. Mandy did a great ... job guarding her."

The Bruins have been working on a type of play with higher, more consistent energy. As the season progresses, they have been accomplishing that, as evidenced by this weekend's tournament.

"We elevated our play there in that game," Baker said. "We were a lot more aggressive and physical. We're playing where we can get on these tremendous runs. It's just a matter of doing that throughout the whole game."

After conducting their serious business in Hawaii, they had only a few hours to enjoy the tropical sun and crystal clear ocean. Their job, however, was done, and the Bruins let the Rainbow Wahine know just how much damage a score of women from California can cause.

Just diving around

These exceptional athletes and best friends may have separate lives after UCLA, but both seniors strive for a NCAA championship

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Staff

Diver One: Rose Huelskamp is a California girl. This woman from San Diego has a laid-back attitude and has only been diving for six years.

Diver Two: Tracy Wilcox is from Ann Arbor, Mich. She's a veteran with 12 years of diving experience, but no one could tell that just by looking at her smiling face.

With their respective backgrounds, these two senior divers have very little in common. No one can tell at first glance that they're the best UCLA divers; nor can one tell they're the very best of friends.

"Rose and I are like sisters," Wilcox said. "We pretty much know everything about each other."

These seniors, along with their freshman teammates, Anne Baghramian, Delilah Moore and Ami Achrekar, will take off Wednesday to the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs for the NCAA Regional. The regional tournament acts as a selection process that chooses six divers from each zone to compete in the NCAA championships.

JAMIE SCANLON-JACOBS/Daily Bruin

Wilcox has passed the qualifying round; she also made the NCAA championships in her freshman campaign with the Bruins. She has been steadily improving, but her competition has been stiffer in recent years.

The zone in which the Bruins will compete this weekend holds a bounty of talent. With a field that includes foreign Olympians, Wilcox says it'll be a tougher regional this year.

"I'm diving better than I ever have, but the competition is really stiff," Wilcox said. "That's a little frustrating but I'll try the best I can and show everyone how well I'm doing."

Another factor that increases the difficulty of this year's regional is the meet's location. The Air Force Academy is located thousands of miles above sea level. Simply put, breathing gets difficult because less oxygen is available.

"It's really wild," Huelskamp explains. "There's this funny sign in the pool that says 'The Air is Rare.' You have to stop for breath on your climb to the platform. And once you dive in, you want to come back to surface as fast as possible because you just want to breathe so badly. It's nuts."

Huelskamp has also been getting better. Considering she only started diving her junior year of high school, she has made a giant splash at the pool, with accomplishments such as competing in last year's spring and summer nationals.

The key to these divers' improvement has been a strong work ethic. Diving is a sport that especially requires technique practice sessions filled with repetitions. Under the constant supervision of diving head coach Andy Kwon, each diver is scrutinized for every somersault, twist and body placement, head to toe, dive after dive.

Huelskamp, for one, realizes the importance of work.

"I'm pretty new and still learning," Huelskamp said. "I know where I want to go in this sport so I figured if I'm going to work out, I'm going to work out hard. It's a waste of time if you don't."

Sure, they're used to the training demands now, but they would've answered otherwise had they been asked about it four years ago.

"It rained a lot our freshman season," Huelskamp said, "so we had double practice days. It was just nice to have someone like Tracy to deal with it with because it was all new to us."

"Our freshman year was a big transition," Wilcox adds, "because we had to get used to having practice in the morning and afternoon, lifting weights and doing all the regular freshman things on top of that. It was actually a good bonding

Despite a persistent backache, sophomore forward Maylana Martin has led the Bruins in scoring and rebounding this season with 19.7 points and 7.9 rebounds per game.

W. BASKETBALL: Star forward plays with a chronic back injury to help lead team to NCAA tournament

By Chris Umpierre
Daily Bruin Contributor

The pain shoots up her back each time she boxes out for a rebound. It throbs every time opposing players check her with their forearms when she tries to post up in the paint. Even when she does simple things like washing her face in the morning, her back aches.

So it is no wonder that Maylana Martin's coach and teammates on the UCLA women's basketball team are shell-shocked that Martin, a sophomore forward, has been able to average 19.7 points and 7.9 rebounds a game. Those numbers place her second in the Pac-10 in both categories, despite playing with a sore back the entire year.

It becomes even more remarkable when you take into consideration that Martin, because of the pain from her back, hasn't been able to practice much with her teammates this season.

"I think she's having an unbelievable year, considering she's in a great deal of pain," said UCLA head coach Kathy Olivier. Olivier's team is currently 19-8 overall, 14-4 in the Pac-10, and headed for the tournament on Friday to play Michigan – largely because of the play of Martin. "Considering her back has been bothering her since our first game of the year, I think she's sucked it up for our team and is doing a great job."

"It's really amazing," sophomore center Janae Hubbard said, who has been nursing a fractured foot all season, and knows what competing despite injury is like. "I don't know how she's been able to do it."

Both Olivier and Hubbard concur that it takes a special person to play through the pain that Martin does each and every game, let alone score 20 points and pull down 8 rebounds.

"Because of her focus and her intensity, I think that she gets into the game, and doesn't feel the pain as much as some people would," Olivier said. "It takes a special person, a special player to be able to do that."

The pain in her lower back from two degenerated discs, Martin believes, is from the excessive pounding that comes from playing basketball year-round in 1997.

Martin went to Brazil to play for the U.S. Junior Championship team in the summer after completing her freshman year at UCLA.

After Martin helped the U.S. capture their first-ever gold medal at the World Championships, she went to Europe with her Bruin teammates to

March Madness begins early with ridiculous selection draws

COLUMN: UCLA faces long road while Arizona gets breezy walk in park

Mark Shapiro

I saw Ozzy Osbourne in concert once, and he started the show saying, without a hint of irony, "Let the madness begin!"

Isn't it interesting that a man who bit the head off of a bat would talk about the madness getting ready to begin, like he wasn't already completely out of his gourd.

In this same vein, isn't it strange to say that March Madness begins with the first round of the NCAA tournament, because this year's iteration started the day the selection committee got together to finalize the draw.

Let's see, we win 22 games this season with an RPI of 13, and we pull a six seed in the toughest region in the tournament. Meanwhile, New Mexico, which plays in a weaker conference, finished the season with a loss to UNLV, and has a home court called The Pit, gets a fourth seed.

> UCLA's draw in the South Region ... immediately brings two words to mind ... oy ve!

Oh yeah, when we played them this year in the Wooden Classic, we beat the ever-lovin' crap out of them, but they're still the fourth seed.

Sure, that decision was made by a well-adjusted person – yeah, and Dick Vitale is actually really mellow.

Then there's UCLA's draw in the South Region, which immediately brings two words to mind ...

LECTURE: Speaker from Hawaii stresses change through involvement

By Marisa Yamane
Daily Bruin Contributor

A powerful Hawaiian chant echoed through Ackerman Union's Viewpoint lounge on Monday evening.

It called upon the 'aumakua, or ancestral guardian spirits, to bless and give spiritual guidance to Haunani-Kay Trask, the outspoken leader of the native Hawaiian sovereignty struggle and the speaker for the evening.

The chanter presented Trask with a ho'okupu, a traditional Hawaiian gift of bananas and sweet potatoes wrapped in tea leaves. As Trask took center stage, the predominantly Pacific-Islander audience applauded and greeted her with a warm aloha.

Trask's goal was to teach the Pacific Islanders how to empower

Barbie creator visits as guest for conference on self image

SPEAKER: Handler serves as role model through work with breast cancer

By Luan Huynh
Daily Bruin Contributor

When Hillel, a Jewish-religious center, hosted a conference on woman's self-image, they chose an interesting guest: Barbie's mother.

Ruth Handler, the 81-year-old creator of the Barbie doll, knew she was onto something good when she conceived of Barbie 39 years ago, but had no idea that Barbie would become the cult figure that she is today.

Blue-eyed, blonde and irregularly proportioned Barbie has increasingly come under attack as women's images become a heated issue.

Many Jewish women who attended the conference on Monday see Barbie as something they once aspired to be but eventually learned that they could not attain.

"What people have interpreted from her is very individual," said Handler. She claims that she did not create Barbie as an object of aspiration, but as a doll that little girls can project their fantasies onto. Handler's goal was to make Barbie as non-specific as possible.

Handler got the idea of the Barbie doll from three Lilli dolls she bought in Switzerland for her daughter, Barbara. The Lilli dolls were tall, thin and had large breasts.

It did not occur to Handler to change Barbie's proportions, because she wanted the doll to look good in clothing. At the same time, Handler said that the way Barbie looks is "unimportant."

In response to critics who believe that Barbie is a source of oppression, Handler said, "Many of today's young achievers can trace their success back to their days of playing with Barbie."

Students witness AIDS stigma firsthand

PROJECT: Volunteers for Bio 40 learn from time spent in local programs

By Catherine Turner
Daily Bruin Contributor

UCLA students have been volunteering at local AIDS and HIV organizations in an attempt to lessen stigmas surrounding the virus and to show personal compassion and understanding.

"Our society stigmatizes against those with AIDS. AIDS is a major problem, and we need to provide support for people with AIDS and make people aware of what they are going through," said David Tuckman, a fourth-year political science student Tuckman, along with other students in Dr. Roger Bohman's class on AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases (Biology 40), are required to volunteer at least six hours of their time to a local AIDS or HIV organizations.

Although many students volunteered with the primary intention of fulfilling their hours for the class, many felt that when they left their volunteer sites they had gained a better understanding of the AIDS epidemic and the people inflicted by it.

"During the APLA (AIDS Project Los Angeles) food drive I was exposed to the public's opinions and beliefs about HIV and AIDS," said Connie Gomez, a volunteer and first-year psychobiology student.

> "I experienced the same stigmatization that those who have the disease deal with every day."
> Connie Gomez
> Psychobiology student

Gomez found that people assumed that she was HIV-positive because she volunteered at the food drive. "People felt uncomfortable to be around me, and their true feelings about AIDS were uncovered," she added.

"I experienced the same stigmatization that those who have the disease deal with every day."

With the discoveries of new treatments like protease inhibitors, which prolong the lives of HIV positive and AIDS infected people, both uninfected and infected people are finding it increasingly important to educate the public and lessen the stigmatization.

Instead of living five years, HIV-positive patients are more likely to survive the early stages of the disease.

GSA to address dissolving ineffective Assembly

GOVERNMENT: Members rarely meet, use power to override Forum decisions

By Ann Hawkey
Daily Bruin Contributor

Tonight the future of the Graduate Students' Association (GSA) Assembly will come into question.

The Assembly, the main governing body of GSA, has recently been scrutinized and had its effectiveness questioned. The GSA Forum will discuss whether a proposal to eliminate the Assembly should be placed on this spring's ballot.

The Assembly, which in the past held full authority over GSA affairs, has since lost most of its responsibilities; much of its power has been assimilated into other GSA organizations.

"The Assembly is kind of like a defunct organization that's been around for years," said Jason Ong, external vice-president of GSA.

The Assembly consists of 11 councils each with representatives from the various academic departments. The number of seats allotted to each department depends on the number of students enrolled. This year, the Assembly has 140 available seats with 96 of these positions filled.

"Over the years, power has slowly been moved to the Forum," said Lance Menthe, GSA's internal vice-president.

"Now the only role it has is special elections, though technically it could override any decision made by the Forum," he continued.

The Forum is GSA's main legislative organization. The 11 councils are represented by a total of 22 delegates this year and an additional five delegates from special interest groups.

Much of the Assembly's power remains in its ability to overturn Forum decisions. Although this power has rarely been used, some feel it is still necessary.

"It's important to have something there ... so that we could all come together at one time and have people who we know are going to be responsible," said Pedro Sanchez, vice-president of the Health Professionals Council.

This role as a check to the power of the Forum is where the Assembly's greatest power lies, but its main function over the past decade has been special elections.

Since 1995, the Assembly has held two such elections.

Due to its large size, the group conducts its votes by mail ballot and rarely meets. The last full meeting of the Assembly was in 1989.

"It's there on paper, but it's not really there in bodies," said Andrew Westall, GSA president. "It's kind of like a theoretical body of GSA. It doesn't really meet unless it has to."

This ineffectiveness is why GSA will consider getting rid of the Assembly.

"It's a really good idea to disband the Assembly," said Ong. "In the past

COMMUNITY BRIEFS

Fight continues over student loan rates

The interests of college students and bankers clashed in a high-stakes subcommittee meeting in Washington last week, as lawmakers tried to find a compromise on the impending change in student loan rates.

At issue is an $11 billion savings over five years to students whose school loan rates will be dropped starting in July. This aspect of the Higher Education Reauthorization Act was debated Thursday in a hearing in front of the Subcommittee for Postsecondary Education.

The financial institutions that loan the 70 percent of student financial aid not covered by direct loan are attempting to stop the mandated change in interest rates, and are threatening to pull their business from that market.

Currently, student loan rates are set by a formula of the 91-day Treasury bill interest plus 3.1 percent – totaling 8.25 percent. The new law would reduce the interest rates to 7.1 percent by setting the rate on a formula based on 10-year T-bills plus 1 percent.

Student advocates are understandably thrilled with the expected drop in interest rates. With the average student graduating with a debt of $13,000, the savings could add up to over $650 over the 10-year life span of the loan. For graduate students, that would add up to even more.

David Foy, press secretary for subcommittee chairman Buck McKeon, R-Santa Clarita, said Thursday's meeting consisted mostly of testimonials, not any decisions on the future of the law.

Professor will teach 'Star Trek' at Riverside

Imagine sitting down to class and opening your notebook as the professor starts to speak. He begins with an explanation of the Klingon Worf and the humanity of the android Data. He then says that the midterm will cover the difference between Captain Kirk and Captain Picard. Some sort of sci-fi fantasy? Not really. Daniel Bernardi, assistant professor at UCLA's School of Theater, Film and Television, is offering a course next quarter at UC Riverside that will take an academic look at the "Star Trek" phenomenon.

"'Star Trek' has been around for 30 years," he says. "It has become a mass-media conglomerate. It's about race, gender and class differences. It's the ideal text."

Bernardi says that the "Star Trek" series "reflects and refracts" the world today. The characters, he says, are metaphors for racial differences, gender and sexuality.

Organizations in "Star Trek" also reflect the world today. One of the "most obvious" parallels between the world of "Star Trek" and today is seen in the sixth movie. The Federation (which is an allegory for NATO, according to Bernardi) is needed to bridge the gap and help its enemies, the Klingons (which Bernardi parallels to the former Soviet Union).

Bernardi notes that names and places echo real life. Chancellor Gorkon is Gorbachev, and the planet that explodes is Praxis, which is a Marxist term. Bernardi says the appeal of the different series may stem from the historical context of each. "The 'Star Trek' of the 1960s was about anti-war and civil rights," Bernardi says. "'The Next Generation' is neo-conservative and reactionary. There's less progressivism. 'Deep Space Nine' is a metaphor for the 'all just get along' idea. A station cramped with aliens just trying to get along. It's multi-culturalism."

Bernardi says that he has no favorite episode, but rather has favorite characters. Data (the android in "Star Trek TNG") is an ironic allegory for racial differences. He is a metaphor, Bernardi says, for whites understanding racial difference. "Worf (the Klingon) fights assimilation on the show."

While "Star Trek" is Gene Rodenberry's outlook and hope for the future, Bernardi sees a similar outlook for the real world as well. "Diversity is the key to surviving," he says of the future. "We must be egalitarian or risk continuing down the current historical track in becoming a technically superior version of the Roman Empire."

Finals on the frontier

Snipers, gunfire and mountains of mud comprise just another day for UCLA's Army ROTC squad members

Photos and story by Michael Ross Wacht

They loaded on their rucksacks as they looked into the day ahead of them. Eight different terrains, eight different missions; a chance for each member of the squad to prove his or her leadership abilities.

Faces smeared with earth-toned paint, they began planning for their first mission. Terrain models were made out of dirt and twigs, and duties were assigned to every member of the group. Exams and school life seemed to fade away as they began to ascend a mountain in search of a hidden enemy.

Silently, the squad made its way up the mountainside until bright flashes of light and sounds of gunfire came from the brush above. The group dropped to the ground, and began to return fire and advance on the enemy above. While some of the squad held the enemy down with the constant sound of blank gunfire, others surrounded and forced her to surrender. After searching the sniper's body for hidden information, the group established a perimeter of defense and then sat back, relaxed and waited for their evaluations from their commanding officer.

The members of this group are members of UCLA's Army ROTC on a Field Training Exercise, or FTX for short, at Camp Pendleton Marine Base in Southern California. Along with courses in strategy and political science, AROTC members are required to participate in actual field training as part of their overall education in Military Science. These photographs were taken of Squad 5 – only one of the many groups comprised of UCLA, USC and Cal State Long Beach AROTC members – as they made their way through each of the exercises.

Cadet Seamone returns fire upon the "enemy."

Author speaks at conservative, libertarian forum

SPEECH: Groups meet to discuss differences, find common political ground

By Barbara Ortutay
Daily Bruin Contributor

Some conservative, white males consider themselves an endangered species at UCLA. They do exist, however, or at least they did on Monday night at a Young Americans for Freedom (YAF) and Bruin Republicans forum.

"It's important to have intelligent debate about libertarianism and conservatism, when those voices on campus are drowned out by extreme leftist, race-based, communist and socialist organizations," said Daniel Rego, vice chairman of YAF.

The room was half-filled, mostly with members of YAF, the Bruin Republicans and some unidentified men in dark suits, who turned out to be Republican congressional candidate Dave Churchman, his campaign manager and Shawn Steele, treasurer for the California Republican Party. Around 15 men and one woman attended the forum.

Don Feder, author of "Who's Afraid of the Religious Right," delivered an ornate lecture about his days as a young Libertarian, his conversion to conservatism and what it means to be a conservative in this country.

"Conservatism is about creating a society of decency. God, family and country are the cornerstones of a conservative society," he said.

"The true conservative does not hate the state. He does, however, hate what the left has done to the government. Without the naked sword of the state, men would devour each other like beasts," he added.

His speech also touched on the differences between conservatism and libertarianism, which, he said, tend to be clamped together at times.

YAF, according to Chairman MacLane Key, is "a group of freedom-loving, limited government conservatives and libertarians" on campus. He added that although Feder's speech focused on conservatism, libertarians were equally present in the audience.

A quote on the blackboard aimed to avoid all confusion:

"Conservatives are not libertarians, and vice versa."

According to Feder, although the two doctrines are fundamentally different, it doesn't mean that the two cannot work together on issues.

"I'm more than happy to work with libertarians, liberals, leftists and vegetarians, but I insist that distinctions be made on who's who and what's what," he said.

Feder addressed specific arguments from the liberal perspective.

"Liberals say (conservatives) want to legislate morality. In reality, every law ever created regulates morality. Including traffic laws," he said.

A re-emerging issue during the event was pornography, especially

Tensions tighten after police-led slaughter

YUGOSLAVIA: Diplomats attempt to avoid spurring an Albanian civil revolt

By Dusan Stojanovic
The Associated Press

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia – While sobbing relatives filed past the disfigured corpses of loved ones slain in a Serb crackdown, a U.S. envoy visited the tense province of Kosovo on Tuesday, trying to prevent simmering hatred from boiling over into a new Balkan war.

The diplomat, Robert Gelbard, demanded that international forensics experts be allowed to examine the bodies of the ethnic Albanian victims – but within hours, ethnic Albanian officials said Serbians had taken away 49 corpses and buried them in a mass grave.

The claim could not immediately be confirmed. If true, it is certain to inflame widespread outrage over Serbia's behavior in the troubled province where a Serb police crackdown last week killed at least 74 ethnic Albanians.

Gelbard conveyed Washington's revulsion at the Serbs' use of "brutal, disproportionate and overwhelming force" in the southern province and demanded that both sides halt the violence.

Acting under strong international pressure, Serbia for the first time offered to talk with Kosovo Albanians, saying it is "the only way to improve political processes" to solve "vital issues."

The ethnic Albanians, who outnumber Serbs nine-to-one in Kosovo, did not immediately respond to the offer, which was announced Tuesday night by Yugoslavia's official Tanjug news agency.

If the offer is sincere, it will put pressure on ethnic Albanian leaders who have always advocated pacifism but insist on independence.

Turmoil in Kosovo has revived fears of a new Balkan conflict. Many ethnic Albanians want to secede from Serbia, the dominant republic in the Yugoslav federation. On Monday, the United States and five other Western CANADA: Hunters fight animal lovers' insistence that killings be outlawed

By David Crary

ST. JOHN'S, Newfoundland – Weary of being branded vicious thugs, Canada's seal hunters are fighting back with a slick marketing campaign, touting such products as seal pepperoni and cure-almost-anything seal-oil pills.

It's a new tactic for the sealers, who face a high-decibel trans-Atlantic protest campaign as the seal-hunting season moves into full swing over the next few weeks.

The anti-sealing lobby is recruiting celebrities to help oppose what it calls "the largest slaughter of marine mammals in the world." Rallies are planned in London and Ottawa this month to protest the federal government's willingness to raise the seal quota to its highest level in years.

"The seal hunt will be shut down – make no mistake about it," said animal-rights activist Paul Watson, the co-founder of Greenpeace. "If we have to drag the Canadian flag through the mud to do it, we'll do so."

In Newfoundland, there is equally strong determination to keep the hunt going.

Public-relations kits being prepared by the sealing industry contain no images of seals but sport plenty of glossy photos of appetizing dishes prepared with seal meat.

HMO regulations appear on horizon for legislators

CONGRESS: Government, businesses contest future of health insurance, care

By Laura Meckler
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – Business groups, horrified by a strong push in Congress to rein in HMOs, are quietly devising a voluntary alternative that they hope will blunt the politically popular proposals.

But even House Speaker Newt Gingrich says some regulation of managed care is bound to become law. That may include the proposal that worries American businesses most: the right to take health insurance grievances to court.

Meanwhile, a very visible battle continues between supporters and opponents who have competing studies and ad campaigns bolstering their claims.

"We've slowed the momentum and caused people on the (Capitol) Hill to take a second look," said Dan Danner, chairman of the Health Benefits Coalition, which released an analysis Tuesday assessing the new requirements and costs of a leading House proposal backed by Rep. Charlie Norwood, R-Ga.

These studies – all done by supposedly neutral parties – argue opposite effects of the same proposal. One side says the Norwood bill would raise premiums by 0.7 percent to 2.6 percent; another predicts 23 percent.

The answer matters. Polls indicate the public supports new mandated protections, but only if they don't substantially increase costs.

The leading congressional proposals all include basic protections for patients who have become

U.N. diplomat heads to Iraq for inspections

MANAMA, Bahrain – An American-led team of U.N. weapons inspectors ended its latest mission to Iraq on Tuesday after searching eight sensitive sites – areas that Iraqi sources said included the Defense Ministry and barracks of the elite Republican Guards.

The six-day mission by Scott Ritter and his 50-member team had been considered a first test of Iraq's compliance with a Feb. 23 accord on the U.N. searches for banned weapons.

Janet Ann Sullivan, a spokeswoman for the U.N. inspectors, declined to identify the sites visited but said: "All sites were inspected to the satisfaction of the inspection team."

Also Tuesday, a U.N. envoy arrived in Bahrain to form a diplomatic group to accompany inspectors on the true test of compliance: searches of Saddam Hussein's palace grounds.

Iraq once vowed it would never open the palaces to arms inspectors. But under threat of an U.S.-led attack, it backed down as part of last month's accord.

The accord brokered a compromise by which the palace inspections would go through, but only with an escort of U.N. diplomats. The first inspections of palaces are expected later this month.

United States could lose U.N. voting rights

UNITED NATIONS – The United States is close to losing its U.N. voting rights in the General Assembly if it does not pay a major part of the $1.3 billion it owes the organization, the chief U.N. financial officer said Tuesday.

Secretary-General Kofi Annan is expected to raise the issue with President Clinton and other U.S. officials on Wednesday.

Annan's Feb. 23 agreement with the Iraqis to open President Saddam Hussein's palaces to U.N. arms inspectors is also expected to figure prominently in the discussions.

Losing voting rights would cost the United States considerable influence in the world organization at a time when Washington is relying on it to determine if Iraq has destroyed its weapons of mass destruction.

The U.N. Charter says member states lose their voting rights "if the amount of its arrears equals or exceeds the amount of the contributions due from it for the preceding two full years."

"The U.S. is approaching that time," said Chief U.N. financial officer Joseph Connor.

Computers for power system being tested

Technicians are guardedly optimistic that the complex computer systems making possible energy deregulation in California will be ready by the end of the month.

That's the new, self-imposed deadline for two agencies setting up the state's new competitive power market. Computer problems had postponed the start of deregulation, originally planned for Jan. 1.

The California Independent System Operator (ISO) – which will coordinate the movement of power – and the Power Exchange, or PX – which will act as a kind of electricity trading floor – are testing their computers.

PX's systems are working as they should, said spokesman Ed Freudenburg. ISO computers aren't there yet, but progress is being made daily, the agency said Monday.

The state decided last year to allow competition in California's $20-billion electricity market.

Utilities such as Pacific Gas & Electric Co. and Southern California Edison will continue to generate power, but will sell it wholesale to retailers through a new electricity exchange.

Consumers and businesses will be able to choose from which company they buy power.

Defendant admits to previous lies

TRIAL: Murder suspect in Ngor case contradicts himself on witness stand

By Linda Deutsch
The Associated Press

A Cambodian-born gang member sat on the witness stand Tuesday with his hand over his eyes as jurors watched a videotape of him giving police incriminating evidence against fellow gang members in the killing of Oscar-winning actor Haing Ngor.

Thol May, 20, testified that he recognized his voice and knew what he had said but insisted that he was telling a made-up story. May, whose gang nickname is T-Bone, was the fourth prosecution witness to recant all or part of his statements to police about the Ngor killing.

The prosecution alleges that Ngor, 55, who starred in the movie, "The Killing Fields," was the victim of a robbery by gang members who needed money for cocaine. There are no eyewitnesses to the crime and the items allegedly stolen – a gold Rolex watch and a gold necklace containing a picture of Ngor's dead wife – have not been found.

Prosecutor Craig Hum is relying on video and audio tapes as well as witnesses' prior testimony at a preliminary hearing in an effort to prove the defendants guilty. In opening statements, he warned jurors that many of the witnesses were frightened and would claim they lied earlier.

"You saw yourself on the videotape?" the prosecutor asked May on Tuesday.

"No, but I listen to it," May said, insisting, "It's a lie."

"Why did you make up this story?" Hum asked.

"I don't know," the witness responded.

"It just popped into your head?" the prosecutor asked.

"Yeah, just popped in my head," May said.

The story he told police several times on video and audio tapes recounted two visits from two of the three defendants charged with Ngor's murder.

He said Jason Chan, 20, known as "Cloudy," and Indra Lim, 20, known as "Solo," visited him two weeks before the killing and showed off a gun. May identified a picture of a Glock semiautomatic nine millimeter handgun – the type of gun used to shoot Ngor.

On the day Ngor was killed, Feb. 25, 1996, the men came by again and asked if he was interested in joining them in "a jack move," slang for a robbery, May told police. May said he refused because "it ain't my stuff."

He said both Chan and Lim, who were known rock cocaine users, talked for about two hours of the planned robbery and their desire to get enough money for more cocaine.

Schools hope to teach more minority authors

EDUCATION: Books may help students of color relate better to material

By Julian Guthrie
San Francisco Examiner

SAN FRANCISCO – School officials in San Francisco want to overhaul required reading lists so that up to seven of every 10 books used in classes are by minority authors.

"In a district that is nearly 90 percent students of color, the point of education is not to glorify Europe, but to (let) students see themselves in the curriculum," said San Francisco school board member Steve Phillips, a leader of the effort to change the curriculum.

This could mean that if a ninth-grade English teacher chose three books by authors such as Shakespeare, Chaucer and Mark Twain, the remaining seven books would have to be by minority authors. Orwell's "Animal Farm" could be edged out by Amy Tan's "The Kitchen God's Wife." Charles Dickens' "Great Expectations" could be shelved in favor of Toni Morrison's "Sula."

"We want every ethnic group to be represented, but I really see this as a way to help African-American students," school board member Keith Jackson said.

Although African Americans account for fewer than 16 percent of high school students in the San Francisco Unified School District, Jackson thinks it would be reasonable to mandate that 50 percent of all required reading be of books by African-American authors.

"If students are required to read 10 books a year, why not have five books by black authors?" Jackson said. "They will identify with authors like Terry McMillan and Alice Walker."

The measure, which would dramatically overhaul the high-school English curriculum – replacing some of the literary giants with a more multicultural canon – stirred little opposition when it was introduced at a Mar. 5 school board meeting. It will go before the Board of Education for a final vote Mar. 24.

"I think we need to rethink the traditional canon," Phillips said. "It's outdated. There are new authors who should be added."

But the proposed changes are not without opposition.

"Quality literature doesn't glorify Europe or any other geographical place; it explores the human condition," said Danise Chandler, who has taught English at George Washington High School for more than 30 years.

"Nothing has more resonance with students – at least when taught properly – than Shakespeare. You can teach 'Macbeth' in the ghetto; 'Julius Caesar' to kids concerned about power; 'Romeo and Juliet' to those with heartache."

San Francisco is not alone in re-examining its core teaching, according to Pedro Noguera, University of California at Berkeley education professor and a former Berkeley school board member.

"There is a move in many high schools across the country to re-examine the canon and re-examine the kinds of literature kids are being exposed to," Noguera said. "It comes at a time when we're thinking about new ways to connect with kids and make reading and learning more relevant and interesting."

Packard gift will benefit preservation of landscapes

ENVIRONMENT: Donation of $175 million will start plans of salvaging nature

The Associated Press

LOS ALTOS, Calif. – A philanthropic foundation is offering $175 million – one of the largest such grants in U.S. history – to preserve California's scenic landscape before it is lost to development.

The five-year program by the David and Lucile Packard Foundation is aimed at protecting open space, farmland and wildlife habitat across the state, the San Jose Mercury News reported Tuesday.

"We want to preserve valuable open space for this and future generations to enjoy," said Colburn Wilbur, executive director of the foundation. "Once these places are lost, they're lost. If you don't get started now, these places just disappear."

Only donations by the Rockefeller family between the 1920s and the 1950s to establish Grand Teton, Acadia and Virgin Islands national parks are of similar scope in American environmental philanthropy, parks experts said.

The foundation, based in Los Altos, will spend $35 million a year – four times what the California state parks department spent last year on land acquisition statewide.

Beginning this year, the money will be used to purchase properties along

UCLA BRUINS

OPEN LETTER TO THE UCLA STUDENT BODY

Dear Students:

I hope you enjoyed the 1997 Bruin Football season. We finished the year with a victory over Texas A&M in the Cotton Bowl and were Pac-10 co-champions ranked 5th in the nation. We are riding a 10-game winning streak, and this fall we have every intention of picking up where we left off. Our goal is to win every game and end the season as National Champions.

A major factor that could help push the Bruins to the top is you, the UCLA student body. The heart and soul of college football is the spirit displayed by students. We need your support in creating an energetic atmosphere in the Rose Bowl for all five home games. When the people in the seats are charged, the players on the field feed off your energy.

We are already working hard to prepare for the upcoming season. Our players and coaches are involved in an early-morning off-season conditioning program. I am proud of the efforts of our students-athletes, but what I am asking for now is that the student-fan become just as involved and dedicated. Spring ball starts on April 7th. Come out and watch the team on Spaulding Field. You will enjoy what you see and be on your way to becoming the best student-fan you can be.

The biggest commitment you can make as a student-fan is to purchase season tickets. I promise you five Saturdays of exciting football. Read the information below and buy your tickets now.

This is your team; this is your school -- let's do it together!

Sincerely,

Bob Toledo
Head Football Coach

UCLA
STUDENT SPORTS PACKAGES

Applications for 1998-99 Student Sports Packages (SSP) are now available at the Central Ticket Office (West Center) and Student Union Office (A-Level, Ackerman Union). Completed applications will be accepted beginning Monday, March 16 at 9:00 am at the Pauley Pavilion Ticket Office.

The first 500 applicants will receive a UCLA SSP for the 1998-99 sports year. All other applications received will be entered into a random draw to be held in late July.

Each SSP will admit the bearer to all five home football games, the men's basketball games listed under the plan that you choose and all other regularly scheduled home athletic events next year.

Applicants must use an official application in its original form. Each applicant may submit one application and request a maximum of one SSP. They are non-transferable. You must be a currently enrolled UCLA student, possess a UCLA student ID and ticket to get into the games.

Unsuccessful applications will be sent notification and a refund in the mail between August 19 and 28.

Because of the high demand for men's basketball tickets, we do not anticipate that tickets will be available to individual games next season.

Assuming UCLA is participating in a post-season football bowl game, or in the NCAA Basketball Tournament, only those students who apply for an SSP will be eligible to purchase those tickets.

Seating locations at UCLA venues are similar to last year. All student seating continues to be festival style general admission, except for the UCLA-USC football game where your prepaid priority number is exchanged for a reserved seat.

For more information on UCLA SSP policies and procedures and the random draw, pick up an application at the Central Ticket Office or Student Union.

Satellite agreement to be considered

RUSSIA: Negotiations over space technology could benefit both sides

By Laura Myers
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – Russia may be allowed to launch more foreign commercial satellites to earn millions for its cash-strapped space agency, as the United States seeks assurances that Moscow can afford to participate in an international space station.

Vice President Al Gore and Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin met Tuesday at the State Department to discuss U.S.-Russia space cooperation and other programs, including halting the spread of missile and nuclear weapons technology.

They read messages from Presidents Clinton and Boris Yeltsin, spurring the two sides on in their 10th meeting since the two leaders established the commission for economic and technological cooperation five years ago.

Gore emphasized a need for economic reform and to engage more state and regional officials in cooperative ventures, while Chernomyrdin said the commission was moving the two countries "to new horizons."

Neither gave any indication of a striking new departure in the relationship.

U.S. officials say they are not linking the issues of whether Russia can launch more satellites and whether it will keep promises to stop assisting Iran's weapons programs. But the Clinton administration acknowledges it doesn't want to reward Russia with new satellite contracts if Moscow continues to do business in weapons technology.

"It's not a question of the U.S. government offering an inducement to the Russian government," said Jonathan Salter, a foreign policy spokesman for Gore. "In fact, expansion of the U.S.-Russia commercial space cooperation requires only that existing commercial plans be allowed to unfold free of concerns related to ballistic missile proliferation."

A senior administration official said the United States is hoping to boost Russia's space program partly to help Moscow come up with money to contribute to the $21 billion international space station, which is supposed to start construction this summer. The project, due to be completed in 2003, has been delayed by Russia's inability to pay.

> A 1996 agreement ... limited Russian launches of ... satellites in order to protect American companies.

"It's something that has to be talked through urgently," the administration official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

On weapons, Chernomyrdin insists that Russia is sticking to its promise that the government won't transfer nuclear weapons and missile technology to Iran. "We are true to our commitments, and we shall never depart from them," he said Monday.

Eighteen of Russia's 48 satellite launches last year were for U.S. firms. The Russians also sent up satellites for China, Germany and Luxembourg. The launches were worth $60 million to $100 million each for the Russian Space Agency, which has had trouble paying its bills.

A 1996 agreement signed by Gore and Chernomyrdin limited Russian launches of foreign satellites in order to protect American companies from competition. Since then, however, the situation has changed, with U.S. firms involved in consortiums with Russian agencies to work together on launches.

In their 10th semiannual U.S.-Russia commission meeting, Gore and Chernomyrdin are expected to talk about reviewing the complicated formula that limits Russian satellite launches. They also are planning to meet with executives of Bethesda, Md.-based Lockheed-Martin and visit one of its California facilities Thursday in Silicon Valley.

On the missile issue, Gore and Chernomyrdin will discuss a decree signed by Yeltsin in January aimed at halting assistance to Iran. The decree would prevent Russian export of so-called dual-use technologies that can be used to build missiles, nuclear, biological and chemical weapons. Despite the decree, Russia is continuing construction of a nuclear power plant in Bushehr, Iran, which Moscow says is strictly for energy purposes. Washington strongly opposes it, fearing it might help Iran get access to technology for its suspected nuclear weapons program.

After two days of commission meetings, Gore and Chernomyrdin will talk with Clinton on Wednesday. Chernomyrdin also plans to meet with members of Congress.

Child pornography laws prohibit look-alike images

BAN: Legislation dictates that there be no photos of minors in sexual activity

By Bob Egelko
The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO – Federal appellate judges asked a Clinton administration lawyer Tuesday if Congress went too far in a child pornography law that bans pictures of adults who look like children having sex.

The case before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals is the first federal court test of the 1996 law, which makes it a crime to produce any visual depiction that "is, or appears to be, of a minor engaged in sexually explicit conduct." The law applies to computer-generated images as well as films and photographs.

The U.S. Supreme Court in 1982 upheld a law banning non-obscene pictures of sexually explicit conduct by minors, saying the law protected the children in the pictures from sexual exploitation. Justice Department lawyer Jacob Lewis argued Tuesday that children would also be protected by a law banning pictures that were intended to look like minors having sex.

"Congress understood that pedophiles use images of children having sex to seduce other children," Lewis told a three-judge appellate panel. That is equally true, he said, whether the person pictured is actually a minor or was only meant to look like one.

But two of the judges said the ban appeared to be based on the content of a picture rather than its incidental effect on children. Content-based regulation of expression is usually difficult to justify under the Constitution's First Amendment.

"If no children are involved, how is it not content-related?" asked U.S. District Judge Donald Molloy of Montana, temporarily assigned to the appeals court. He referred particularly to the ban on computer-generated sexual pictures of minors.

Judge Sidney Thomas said the law could be used to prosecute makers of a film based on "Lolita" even if, as in past versions, an adult woman portrays the minor in a sexual relationship with an older man.

Lewis said the filmmaker could avoid prosecution by showing a dis-

Attention: Students and Faculty in Humanities Courses!

Did you or one of your students write a terrific paper in a humanities course during spring or fall quarters of 1997 or this winter quarter? If so, please plan to submit the paper for recognizing superior achievement in undergraduate research scholarship in the Humanities.

Eligibility

The competition is open to ALL UCLA undergraduates who were/are enrolled in an undergraduate humanities course during either Spring Quarter 1997, Fall Quarter 1997, or Winter Quarter 1998. The submitted paper must have been written as a course assignment and must be nominated by the instructor of record, with a cover letter from the sponsoring professor highlighting the strengths of the paper. (No other application form is necessary.)

Awards

The Teague-Melville-Eliott Prize winner will receive $1065.
The Peter Rotter Essay Prize winners receive $1,000 and $500 each.

Deadline for submission of faculty nominations: Friday, March 20, 1998. But papers can be submitted at any time this quarter between now and then to 271 Kinsey Hall.

For more information, contact your departmental advisor, or you may direct questions to Dr. Janette Lewis, 825-6172 or lewis@humnet.ucla.edu.

HIV

APLA, Being Alive, the Minority AIDS Project and Project Angel Food are among the many proliferating organizations that are working in response to this growing need to treat the early stages.

These organizations also help people cope with symptoms felt in the early stages of the virus. Symptoms include physical adversities such as fatigue and nausea, and emotional impacts such as denial, anxiety, guilt and self pity.

These symptoms make it especially difficult for AIDS and HIV-positive people to carry out everyday tasks, like eating, finding jobs and money, and socializing.

"APLA is a program that provides food, counseling, referrals and support for those suffering with AIDS. We have 1,600 clients, all of which have to be HIV-positive or symptomatic AIDS," said Michael Hernandez, coordinator of the APLA food drive.

In order to be clients at APLA, participants' incomes have to be less than $728 a month, which usually comes from social security and disability.

"For most, the AIDS virus is no longer a death sentence, it's a lifestyle. It's a hard lifestyle," Hernandez said. "My best suggestion is to show compassion."

Biology 40 students also volunteered at Being Alive, where they cleaned the patio area and arranged food for a weekly Sunday social meant to help HIV-positive and AIDS people "socialize, meet new people, and, really, to just hang out," said A.J. Johnson, a volunteer at Being Alive.

Johnson hopes to organize a youth program for teenagers. Most people are diagnosed between the ages of 25 and 35, which means that most people are infected with the disease in their late teens and early 20s.

This fact makes awareness especially pertinent at UCLA, where the students are predominantly within that age group.

Many volunteers feel that educating children at an early age can help to stop both the disease from spreading and the stigmas associated with it.

"Education is the primary means with which we can reduce the stigmas that are associated with the disease," said Azadeh Ensha, a volunteer and first-year communications student.

Through witnessing firsthand the burdens, financial problems and stigmas that are associated with contracting the disease, students have realized the importance of volunteering and regarding the AIDS epidemic with understanding.

Biology 40 has helped a lot of students see the AIDS epidemic in a new way.

"We understand how the AIDS epidemic is spread, about discrimination and the research toward a cure," Tuckman said.

"Our support of APLA, Project Angel Food and other programs is very important. I would encourage every student at UCLA to take Biology 40 because the course really opened my eyes," he added.

claimer that said no minors were used in the production. Thomas was skeptical, noting that under the law, the defendant must also show that the picture was not advertised or promoted to create an appearance of a minor engaging in sexual activity.

"It's impossible to describe 'Lolita' without at least giving the impression that it's about an adult having sex with a minor," Thomas said.

The law was challenged by a group of more than 600 producers and distributors of sexually explicit films and other materials, calling themselves the Free Speech Coalition. Their suit was rejected last year by U.S. District Judge Samuel Conti of San Francisco, who ruled that the law protected children without violating free speech.

> (Sirkin) said the ban on any sexually explicit picture that "appears to be" of a minor was too vague.

H. Louis Sirkin, a lawyer for the organization, told the appeals court that the law went beyond previous child-protection measures and prohibited material based on the presumed effect of its content, a rationale that he said could cover a wide range of legal expression. He also said the ban on any sexually explicit picture that "appears to be" of a minor was too vague.

"In a youth-oriented nation, how do you make an objective determination that they appear to be a minor?" he asked.

HANDLER

After all, Barbie has been a doctor, a teacher, an astronaut, etc; there has also been a fat Barbie, a dreadlocked Barbie, a talking Barbie and even a breast-reduced Barbie.

Handler said that many women treat her with idol status once they find out that she created Barbie. Slowly, Handler said, she realized that Barbie was more than just a doll; she represents something much more important.

"Barbie as an icon has shaped our image of women," said Natalie Stern, a Jewish Campus Service Corps Fellow. Although she expected the conference to be a "Barbie-bashing feast," it was more than that.

Handler has survived many experiences that young women can learn from. When making presentations, she'd recall to audiences that she would have to walk through kitchens, because women were not allowed to use the front door.

One year, Handler became the first woman vice-president on the board of the Toy Association. Traditionally, the vice president becomes the president the next year. However, for the first time, the board also promoted a man to the vice-president position. When it was time for Handler to become president, the board chose the man instead.

More importantly, Handler has survived breast cancer and was the first to mass-market a prosthetic breast.

In 1970, Handler found out that she had breast cancer. After surgery, Handler went back to work. Nothing was said out loud about her illness, she recalls; everything was whispered. She cried at the least instigation.

"I had lost my image of being a woman. I was trying to stay feminine in a man's world," Handler said.

In 1975, Handler was pushed out of Mattel, the toy company that she co-founded with her husband Elliot and his friend, Harold Mattson. Handler was depressed, until it occurred to her to make prosthetic breasts for women who needed them.

The first breast to come out was called Nearly Me. It was made out of contoured foam, silicone gel and an outer-skin of polyurethane film.

Handler was also determined to bring cancer out of the closet. She set out on the lecture circuit to promote her product and to open discourse on breast cancer. It worked. Handler has continued for 15 years.

> (Handler) set out on the lecture circuit to promote her product and to open discourse on breast cancer.

"I was aware of the woman's movement, but I was too busy living it," said Handler, who still believes that a woman's first role is that of a mother.

Mayim Bialik, a junior majoring in neuro-science with a minor in Jewish studies, said she saw Handler as a feminist.

"There is more to this story than what we want to assume as feminists," said Bialik, who organized the conference in conjunction with Jewish women at Cal State Northridge.

"It is an understatement to say that images are forced upon us. It becomes a part of us: what we see, what we are told and what we experience. That is why any dialogue on this subject is healthy dialogue," Bialik added.

SEALS

fairs across Canada. Newfoundland's first seal-leather tannery recently opened. And Canadian and Asian health stores are stocking up on seal-oil pills which allegedly ease arthritis pain, unclog arteries and relieve symptoms of diabetes.

Seal penises are sold in Asia for use in aphrodisiacs.

"We've been carrying on the seal hunt in Newfoundland for 200 years," the provincial fisheries minister, John Efford, said in an interview. "There's no group in the world that's ever again going to stop it."

The hunt almost was stopped in the 1980s. Protests resulted in a European ban on the import of seal pelts, driving large commercial sealing ships out of the business.

Newfoundlanders continued small-boat hunting, but the market was so poor by the early 1990s that only about 50,000 seals were taken annually.

Starting in 1996, the annual kill rose to more than 200,000. Government officials decided to back the industry with temporary subsidies in hopes of partly offsetting the loss of 27,000 jobs when Newfoundland's vital codfish industry collapsed in 1992.

This year's quota is 285,000, and Efford said it could increase if markets for seal products are strong.

Efford says animal-rights activists are more concerned about seals than Canadians struggling to survive in a province with 18-percent unemployment. "Why are these so-called humanitarians not concerned about 400 communities in Newfoundland left without work?" he asks.

Anti-sealing activists have tried to counter the economic argument by suggesting that sealers shift to eco-tourism, serving as guides for tourists wanting to view the seals close-up on their ice floes.

But mostly the anti-sealing campaign depicts the sealers as vicious.

The industry's most vocal antagonist, the London-based International Fund for Animal Welfare, alleges that many seals are skinned alive and abandoned on the ice after their penises are removed for export to Asia. It contends that white-coated baby seals continue to be killed, even though the practice was banned a decade ago.

Last year, the group sent federal fisheries officials a videotape that it claimed showed sealers committing 140 violations of hunt regulations.

The government charged seven sealers with 17 offenses, including failure to kill a seal quickly and using improper instruments.

Tina Fagan, a former radio host who heads the Canadian Sealers Association, says the issue of cruelty is pivotal. Her group has enlisted a national veterinarian watchdog panel to help ensure that the 6,000 licensed sealers use the most humane methods possible.

Efford admits that the hunt is inherently bloody.

"Who would suggest that killing is pretty?" he asked. "You can go into any slaughterhouse in the world – who'd want to take pictures?"

One argument the anti-sealing lobby cannot use is that the seals are endangered. The last government count, in 1994, estimated there were 4.8 million harp seals in the region. Efford says today there are about 6 million, posing a threat to already dwindling fish stocks.

The IFAW says there is no proof that seals are responsible for the cod-fish shortage. The group also disputes claims that the seal industry is worth nearly $20 million a year, saying its net value is minimal if costs of enforcement and government subsidies are deducted.

themselves and to make them realize that despite being such a small group, it is possible to rise up to power in such a big place like UCLA.

"You should always ascend leadership and challenge people at the highest possible level," advised Trask, who currently serves as the director of the Center for Hawaiian Studies at the University of Hawai'i at Manoa (UH).

She strongly encouraged them to get involved in student government because she believes it is associated with tremendous mana, or power.

> "Struggle makes you strong ... you should never give up."
> Haunani-Kay Trask
> Hawaiian political activist

"The institution of student government commands resources, physical space and support, and calls to attention the university administration, the board and the news media," Trask said.

She knows this through first-hand experience. UH's native Hawaiian students, who make up less than 4 percent of the population, recently captured student government.

Trask, who comes from a politically active family, also offered a lot of advice through her own success stories, which she believes comes from her lifelong dedication to political organization.

Trask is an indigenous Hawaiian nationalist, a political organizer, a professor of Hawaiian Studies and an author of several scholarly and literary works. Currently, she is the political strategist for Ka Lahui Hawai'i, the state's largest sovereignty organization and self-proclaimed political entity.

Trask's most recent accomplishment was getting the state of Hawaii to build a $7.5-million educational complex for the Center for Hawaiian Studies, which she considers to be the most visual symbol of their success. But it did not happen overnight.

It was a five-year effort that took thousands of flyers, hours of lobbying, reams of testimony and dogged insistence.

"Struggle makes you strong," Trask said. And in order to be a successful activist, she emphasized, "you should never give up."

Trask has touched the lives of many. "She has been a source of inspiration and a source of strength, and just a mentor to all of us," said Erin Wright, one of the coordinators of the event and a former student of Trask's.

The speaking engagement was hosted by the Pacific Islands Students Association (PISA). As part of their outreach program, PISA invited students from Carson High School to the event. But a majority of those in attendance were UCLA students.

"Since I'm not usually conscious about the political struggle that exists between different cultures, I found her discussion to be very intellectually stimulating," said Ryan Lan, a first-year student majoring in business-economics.

Trask has been an activist for Hawaiian rights and an activist in Hawaii for the past 20 years.

She compares herself to the African-American leader Malcolm X.

"I've done for the Hawaiian people in part what Malcolm X did for his people," Trask said.

increasingly worried that costs, not medicine, are driving decisions about their care.

Plans supported by President Clinton and a leading Senate Republican, Labor and Human Resources Committee Chairman Jim Jeffords of Vermont, would require easy-to-read information about health plans, the right to appeal denials of care to an outside panel and payment for reasonable emergency room visits.

But the Norwood plan goes further, offering new protections for doctors as well as patients. Most controversially, it would let patients sue health plans if the plans denied care. Since 1974, federal law has barred such suits.

Under current law, a patient who is denied an X-ray and later discovers he has cancer can sue for the X-ray's cost. But he can't recover the financial or emotional cost of a delayed cancer diagnosis.

Business groups don't like any new mandates, but they are most worried about new lawsuits. They released a study Tuesday contending it would cost insurance companies $1 billion each year in jury verdicts and lawyer fees, based on doctors' experience with malpractice.

And, worried that employers also could be sued, business groups are threatening to advise their members to drop health insurance for workers if this provision becomes law.

Norwood, a conservative Republican, says businesses are overreacting.

"If you make the right decisions, you don't have to go to court," said Norwood, whose bill has more than 200 House co-sponsors, including many Republicans who usually oppose government mandates on industry.

Worried by that political momentum, businesses hope to offer an alternative.

They're working to form a "voluntary quality council" that would give employers standards to use when negotiating with insurance companies. This could include some of the same things that appear in Congress' proposals, but no business or health plan would be compelled to adopt it.

"It's clearly an alternative to a legislative mandate," said Johanna Schneider of the Business Roundtable, which has joined with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Federation of Independent Businesses to create the alternative. An announcement is expected in the next few weeks.

If companies all demanded the same quality standards, health insurance companies would have no choice but to offer them, Schneider explained.

"We want to push the system as far and as fast as it can go," she said. "Again, in a voluntary way."

But Gingrich this week dampened hopes for a voluntary system.

"The truth is ... we're going to pass some kind of patient protection bill this year," he told the American Medical Association. He suggested it will include the right to sue health plans. "It's going to add a new layer of litigation and a new layer of regulation."

Nevertheless, Gingrich and other GOP leaders in Congress oppose new laws and are looking for ways to stop them. Last fall, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott urged business and insurance groups to begin rallying opposition. They responded a $1-million advertising campaign.

powers and imposed a ban on sales of arms and other equipment to Yugoslavia.

At the United Nations, meanwhile, the Security Council considered the possibility of an arms embargo against Yugoslavia on Tuesday.

"We think the violence should stop. We're talking about deaths of many people and the international community is working together to find a strong response," U.S. Ambassador Bill Richardson told reporters.

Gelbard, while condemning Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic's actions in Kosovo, also renewed his message Tuesday that Washington is opposed to any further splintering of the former Yugoslavia.

> Four children and a dozen women were among the corpses ... A few were burned beyond recognition.

"The United States feels independence is not the answer," he said at a news conference in Pristina, the capital of Kosovo. "The future of Kosovo lies within the borders of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia."

Those words will not be received kindly by the pro-independence Kosovo Liberation Army, whose attacks on Serbian police preceded the Serbs' violent security sweep. Serbia's government insisted that the police action of the past week was "exclusively aimed at fighting terrorism."

The government said the official death toll from last week's violence is 46 ethnic Albanians and six Serb police. But the Albanians say at least 74 of their kin died in two police sweeps through Kosovo's Drenica region.

As mourners came to view their relatives' and neighbors' bullet-riddled, charred bodies, chances of dialogue with the Serbs seemed remote.

"Look what the Serb savages did. They killed women and children," said a man who identified himself only as Fazli. "How does anyone expect us to forget this terrible massacre?"

Serb police had threatened to bury the dead in a mass grave if the decomposing bodies were not claimed Tuesday. Relatives charged that the Serbs wanted to cover up atrocities with swift burials.

Reporters reached the shed containing the bodies by traveling on side roads and walking into virtually deserted Serbica, in the region at the center of last week's crackdown.

At least four children and a dozen women were among the corpses. Some were missing limbs, apparently blown off in explosions. Others had bullet holes in them, and a few were burned beyond recognition.

Police stood guard at the entrance to the shed, and an armored personnel carrier was parked nearby with its gun turret pointed at the mourners.

One dead woman appeared to have been pregnant. One small, dark-haired dead boy with open eyes seemed as if he was reaching out for his mother, who lay next to him.

The body of the brother of alleged KLA leader Adem Jashari had its eyes poked out, Albanian officials said.

The ethnic Albanians said many of the corpses were later carted away by the Serbs for the mass burial.

the state's coast from San Francisco to Santa Barbara, in the Central Valley and in the Sierra Nevada. It will be awarded mostly in grants as part of partnerships with non-profit land trusts, community organizations and, in some cases, local governments.

By 2002, the foundation hopes to have protected 250,000 acres – an area nine times the size of the city of San Francisco.

Foundation officials say land will be selected based on its scenic and strategic value. That includes protecting endangered species, watersheds and key parcels needed to block urban encroachment on agricultural lands.

"This is an extraordinary gesture of philanthropy," said Douglas Wheeler, California's secretary of resources. "While this has been typically a public responsibility, it is also clear that the challenge is so large, it cannot be accomplished by the public sector itself."

The foundation was created in 1964 by computer pioneer David Packard and his wife, who died in 1987.

Now the third largest charitable foundation in the United States, behind Indiana's Lilly Endowment and New York's Ford Foundation, the organization has seen its endowment skyrocket to $9 billion since 1996, when David Packard died at age 83 and left to it nearly all his personal stock holdings in Hewlett-Packard Co.

Its new land initiative, dubbed "Conserving California Landscapes," is the brainchild of the foundation's three-member conservation committee, made up of Julie Packard and her husband, Robert Stephens, as well as her sister, Nancy Packard Burnett. Both women hold degrees in marine biology. Julie Packard is executive director of the Monterey Bay Aquarium.

Under the new program, the foundation will not own any land.

Rather, it will help purchase property for new state parks and other public wildlife preserves. In addition, it will buy development rights to keep farms and ranches in private ownership while blocking urban sprawl. And it plans to buy water rights to help restore struggling salmon runs, all from willing sellers.

"This won't just be environmental groups. We expect to work with local farm bureaus and cattlemen's associations," said Michael Mantell, who has helped draft the plan as a consultant for the California Environmental Trust in Sacramento.

After each tape was played, Hum asked the witness if he said the things jurors had just heard.

"I don't remember what I said," he declared.

"It's not true," he said at another point.

Under cross-examination, May said he was "slow" in school, had a hearing problem resulting from bombings in Cambodia and his memory was damaged by smoking marijuana beginning at the age of 13.

"I got addicted to that," he said. "It help me not to think too much. That's why I smoke marijuana."

He spoke of a feud with the men on trial who blamed him for another gang member's death, and he said he knew his "homies" were mad at him for "ratting" on the men on trial.

Three juries are hearing the case with each jury assigned to one defendant. For Tuesday's session, only two juries were present because the testimony did not involve the third defendant, Tak Sun Tan, 21.

School board member Dan Kelly strongly favors moving to a more diverse curriculum.

"We have to present works that have a broader range of cultural experiences," Kelly said. "Mark Twain's 'Huckleberry Finn,' for instance, has a bias against African Americans. And Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales,' while a great work, has an economic bias. It characterizes people based on their class."

But Chandler said her ninth-grade class is enthralled by Dickens' "Great Expectations."

"It's not a book about a white man or about England," she said. "It's about a person desperately in love, trying to make his way in the world. That is a theme that is color-blind."

child pornography. Feder argued that in general, libertarians support child pornography by giving children the same rights as adults. Martin Chippas, third-year student and vice chairman of Bruin Republicans, said he considers himself a libertarian, but he does not endorse child pornography, and neither do libertarians he knows.

"I don't think James Madison meant Hustler magazine when he drafted the First Amendment. But he meant political freedom, which is why I oppose a constitutional amendment prohibiting flag burning," said Feder.

Feder closed his speech with the following motto: "I always believe the speaker should leave before the audience does."

"Which doesn't always happen at my lectures," he added.

it has served very good purposes, but now it's not really useful with the way GSA is set up."

GSA will discuss putting a proposal on this spring's ballot to dissolve the Assembly. The same proposal was passed by a large margin last spring, but low voter turnout prevented it from taking effect.

This lack of participation in the election reflects a disinterest in student government shown by many graduate and professional students.

"At the graduate level, a lot of people have been in the work force; they're a lot more career oriented," said Ong. "When you look at it from that perspective, it's a lot harder to get them involved in campus life or to take a more proactive role."

"There's no real benefit to taking part in student government," said Gregg Gold, who represents the Biological Sciences Council to the Assembly and the Forum.

"By the time people get to grad school, they no longer need to have student government experience," he continued.

Some have differing views on why graduate student involvement is so low.

"First, we've just had an organizational problem," said Menthe. "Most people don't know what GSA does."

After only 8 percent of graduate students voted in the last election, GSA hopes to remedy the low voter turnout this year with greater publicity.

"The main thing we're going to do is publicize it and do it electronically," said Menthe. "We have a newsletter that will be distributed electronically."

"The key to it is letting them know exactly what GSA can do for them," said Ong.

Hard-earned rights imperiled by bigotry

DISCRIMINATION: State legislature must respect regents' policy on benefits for domestic partners

It's taken nearly 15 years of lobbying for gay and lesbian employees of the University of California to be granted partner benefits. Yet, merely 3 1/2 months after the benefits were approved by the UC Regents, the employees' efforts have hit a legislative roadblock: a discriminatory bill designed to force the UCs to raise their own money to fund domestic partner benefits.

If passed, a measure proposed by Sen. William Knight, R-Palmdale, would eliminate state funding for the domestic partner benefits package.

The UC Regents made their decision in November to extend health benefits to domestic partner employees in the university, and the state needs to respect that.

The state constitution provides that the UC Regents preside over university matters including funding. As trustees of the university, legislators should not intrude upon the regents' jurisdiction. Under Article IX, Section 9 of the California Constitution, the regents have "full powers of organization and governance."

Knight claims that California taxpayers should not be forced to pay for domestic partner benefits that they do not support. He says the UC Regents went against the wishes of the public when they approved the package, and the people should therefore not have to pay for them. But public sentiment does not always yield equity or legality. In 1954, the Supreme Court ruled in Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka that separate is not equal in public schools. Following the decision, there was massive public opposition. But the public's opinions against desegregation were not the "correct" solution either.

The gay and lesbian community pays taxes for heterosexual couples but is virtually being denied its own benefits.

Knight says his bill is simply a response to public sentiment. But the act reeks of bigotry. This is not a new tactic for Knight – several years ago, he wrote a bill that would have voided out-of-state gay marriages in California.

When the regents discussed the benefits in November, one of their chief concerns was making sure that gay and lesbian employees felt welcome in the university. Denying them their rights would have implied that the university did not want them, and regents feared those employees would leave the UC for more competitive institutions offering benefits. The state must not cause the university to regress.

The UC proved that it was competitive among other top institutions offering benefits, and showed that it welcomed all employees regardless of their sexual orientation. Their progress is now being threatened due to intolerant attitudes held by Knight and others.

Knight's proposal is a desperate attempt to deny rights to a sector of the community often blacklisted by prejudiced politicians.

The UC must not be forced to raise funds for itself. The regents' decision must stand, and California needs to fund domestic partner benefits. The state must not allow hate and intolerance to stand in the way of equality.

Just say no to those scary Bruin Walk pushers

SOLICITORS: Crafty ways to outsmart strategies of aggravating peddlers

It's a nice day outside, and as you walk back from class you enjoy the sweet serenity of the chirping birds as the sun shines brilliantly in the sky. Aren't you glad to be done with midterms? Now you can take a deep breath and give a sigh of relief. But off in the distance you can see a body. Something doesn't fit the picture. It seems to be coming straight at you, and as it does a darkness seems to cast over you. The birds have suddenly stopped singing and have begun flying away. Clouds have begun to form and cover the clouds. What's going on?

Alon Frydman

Suddenly, the mysterious object becomes more clear – it's a person. And he quickly runs up and gestures to shake your hand:

Solicitor: Hi, I'm from the children's so-and-so and we're here today to take donations – anything will be fine ("unga yousa gotsa money? looka lika you have some money for kiddies").

You: Sorry, I don't have anything on me now ("unga you here always aska for kiddies, now me broke").

Solicitor: Do you have anything – a dollar? ("unga dollar unga dollar")

You: I'm sorry, I don't have anything to give you ("unga me need eat too").

Solicitor: Maybe a dollar – just a dollar – how about a dollar? ("unga give dollar, cheap bastard, give dollar!")

You: I'm sorry, I really don't have anything and I have to go, too ("unga you pushy and stinky, me want go now").

Solicitor: Thank you for your time ("unga me catch you tomorrow, make from you dollar").

You: OK, sure, man ("unga kiddies no need donation of dollar so no starve; kiddies need donation of toothbrush to fight you breath").

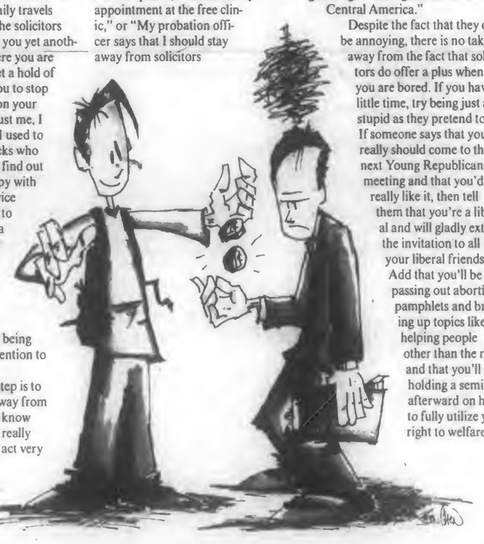
I'm sure you've encountered similar situations in your daily travels along Bruin Walk. So the solicitors have managed to catch you yet another time. No matter where you are on campus, they can get a hold of you and they can get you to stop because they can play on your logic and emotions. Trust me, I used to be one of those schmucks who called during dinner to find out if my victims were happy with their long distance service and if they'd be willing to change companies for a scooby snack. The first thing I was taught in training was how to get the person's attention and then how to move in for the kill.

If you want to avoid being the next victim, pay attention to what the solicitor says.

The solicitor's first step is to divert your attention away from the fact that they don't know you and that you don't really want to stop. They will act very nice, as if they were an old friend looking for a favor. The next step is to talk and talk you into submission. They'll just go on and on.

So now that you know their strategy, it's time to play their game.

First, if someone calls and asks you to switch phone companies, tell them OK and just switch lines before they start going on for hours. If you're approached on campus, walk around the solicitors with your hands in your pockets – and make sure to face the other way. But if you feel the necessity to say something, you may as well have fun and scare them. "I can't stop now, I'm late for my appointment at the free clinic," or "My probation officer says that I should stay away from solicitors since the last accident was strike two" always do the trick. Or you can turn the tables and catch them off guard. You can do this by approaching a solicitor, shaking his hand and asking him for some money.



But if this is not direct enough, you can then simply stare them in the eye and usher up from the bottom of your gut the loudest and most assertive "no!" "No, I don't want to know about the coalition for getting lab animals better housing, and no, I don't want to know about how my tuition is really going toward a secret plot to arm guerrillas in an insurgence against the government in Central America."

Despite the fact that they can be annoying, there is no taking away from the fact that solicitors do offer a plus when you are bored. If you have a little time, try being just as stupid as they pretend to be. If someone says that you really should come to the next Young Republicans meeting and that you'd really like it, then tell them that you're a liberal and will gladly extend the invitation to all your liberal friends. Add that you'll be passing out abortion pamphlets and bringing up topics like helping people other than the rich, and that you'll be holding a seminar afterward on how to fully utilize your right to welfare. If you are lucky you may see them pop a vain. Or you can always do a quickie: So you're a Young Republican, huh? OK, then grow up. You get the point. Get on their nerves just as much as they get on yours. You can be creative; have lots of fun.

Bruin Walk is the Lollapalooza for solicitors. Make sure to visit the various religious booths other than yours. There you can engage in stimulating conversations like: "The beauty is that you don't need to convert; you can stay with your religion but pray to our god. It's beautiful, isn't it?" No, I believe the word you're looking for is contradiction. Say it with me now: con-tra-dik-shon.

Along Bruin Walk, there are even mobile booths that will stick to you and follow you for several meters, trying to get you to hold on to a mysterious neon paper that promises to save you from the devil and his demons.

Other booths put on a grand presentation that taxes the mind as well as the pocket. There are men dressed in suits and bow-ties selling newspapers. I have to say that I do like the sports-outing solicitors who sell tickets to ski-lifts. They are quick and to-the-point: "Hey, buuuddddy, do you ski or snowboard?" No. "Oh, OK." See you later, Keanu.

Solicitors are everywhere and are unavoidable. Some serve a purpose, some serve the great Nike god who will take them to space. Some have value, some truly are wasting their breath. Some are honest, and some are not inhaling. So when you're late to class, when you have no patience or when you're broke, use your wits to avoid getting trapped. If, on the other hand, you are bored, then just use their own tactics and waste a couple minutes in a conversation. Sometimes you may feel like putting your two cents in, sometimes you don't.

Frydman is studying, so leave him e-mail at frydman@ucla.edu.

What is Generation X? Who are we? Unlike the Baby Boomers, we are not coming of age during a war or a "great social movement." What will history have to say about Generation X? State overlooks history in race to be colorblind

EVASION: Legislation, buzzwords convenient ways to downplay oppression by white ruling class

By Elias Serna

"Evade/evasion: trickery; to elude, avoid by misleading statements; baffle; escape an argument, charge."

Amidst a looming, unforeseen cloud of confusion unfolding darkly over the city of Hate – which has been distressed by the numbers 187, 209, 3 and 227 – Gov. Pete Wilson and others explain on television that they are making a California that is "colorblind." The term is an all too familiar buzzword for conservative supporters of California's own ethnic cleansing campaign which is sweeping through all levels of education and other circles.

The meaning of the phrase is not far from something UC Regent Ward Connerly (the key African American spokesperson of Proposition 209) stated on the day of the initiative's victory at the polls: "We can't move forward ... by looking in the rearview mirror at America's mistakes."

The metaphor is fitting, clever and convincing. It is also very telling in that it deliberately eludes the very basic argument of affirmative action activists and supporters: history.

If Connerly's mirror is any indication of the outlook of conservative and neoliberal politicians – blazing down a superhighway toward California's "colorblind future" – it should alert us to the exclusion of those who have built the road and are being left behind to walk. Many believe this machine needs to be repossessed.

Most importantly, these statements embody the misleading nature of right-wing discourse. Indeed, a predominant theme in the current chapter of California's race politics is evasion.

The authors (and supporters) of Prop. 209 strategically avoided any reference to racial history to escape the issue of whites having privilege in this society through the historical subjugation and exploitation of other ethnic groups. They have also offered no significant rebuttal to Jesse Jackson and others' charges against the shameless appropriation of Martin Luther King Jr.'s words and the term "civil rights" (initiative).

Without a doubt, discussing race has become intolerable to many white students and other conservatives. Many feel – or worse, know – they are going to be "attacked."

Serna is a graduate student in the School of Theater, Film and Television, co-founder of Mal Ojo and supporter of Zapatistas.

Greg Magnuson

As communities of color and students across the state protest in defense of programs that serve them, supporters of the "Civil Rights Initiative" (Prop. 187) and now the anti-bilingual education initiative (Prop. 227) are uncomfortable and resent allegations that they are racists.

"Race is not the issue," many respond. "Race is not an issue" is perhaps the more likely underlying thought – and is wishful thinking. In the midst of this flurry of state and federal legislation attacking people of color, it is ironic that the most privileged group in history (white males) are now claiming to be the new "oppressed."

The Mexican American Education Commission, itself a current target of Prop. 209 and the L.A. Unified School District's downsizing plans, held a symposium on the educational status of Chicano/Latino students "from the 1968 East L.A. walkouts to 209."

Among the calls to "reignite the struggle" and the emphasis on understanding the ties between class and culture in this struggle, panelist Peter McLaren, an associate professor of education at UCLA, recognized the nature of recent right-wing attacks and made the important distinction between oppression and malaise.

Oppression is the condition of the slave undergoing social and economic exploitation by another group (whites) or a group that has been historically subjugated to such a relationship.

Malaise is the discomforting psychological condition experienced by the slave-owner, dehumanized because of his powerful position.

The distinction is necessary and directly applicable to the misleading racial policy and cultural attacks going on this very moment in California and the world.

Therefore, to understand the core of right-wing discourse, one must come to terms with two things: first, the key word in the term "colorblind" is "blind" (that is, to history). Second, there is one issue at the center of this Euro-American political self-consciousness, and that is white privilege.

A more just and inclusive concept is "colorful," introduced to me by a first-year student

LETTERS

While leaving my cell and heading to the law library, I was given an article to read from the Daily Bruin by a fellow convict. After reading an article Alex Balekian wrote titled "When punishing criminals, less is not more" (Feb. 18), I felt compelled to respond in an effort to present the other side of the story. As I begin my 19th year in prison for second-degree murder, I too have come to believe that sound measures should be imposed to make sentences on crime more austere. However, unlike Balekian, who didn't do his homework thoroughly in his article, I'd like to refresh Balekian's memory with the fact that it was Gov. Pete Wilson who, in the first place, along with Ronald Reagan, passed the so-called inmate bill of rights. One of the reasons for the bill's being passed was due to the extreme amount of violence in prisons among prisoners and between prisoners and guards. At this juncture in prison history in California, both the sentences and the prison conditions were draconian.

Prison sentences were indeterminate and there were no beards or long hair allowed back then. Prisoners could not purchase their own TVs or radios, and access to the courts was very limited. The milieu in prison became filled with rage and violence. Upon release, for those who were not killed in the daily violence of prison life, these prisoners were turned into monsters by the monster factories they were released from and reeked violent havoc on society. I can assure you that the prisoners of today are not even half as violent or intrepid as the prisoners were in the '60s and '70s when treatment of prisoners was austere.

I wrote all of the above to convey this point: All Balekian is asking for is a repeat of history from the way California prisons were in the '60s and '70s. And we all know that those who don't learn from history are doomed to repeat it. Besides, as someone long ago once said, "If everyone believed in an eye for an eye, the whole world would be blind." As Californians, we should shy away from the quick-fix solutions, and rather contemplate sound solutions to our crime problems, as well as our other problems. It's easy to be like Balekian and others who jump on the bandwagon because it's politically vogue to do so, but as Californians, who are known to set trends for other states in our nation to follow, it would be prudent not to let our emotions override our intellect, so that trends we set are sound and a beacon for others to follow.

UCLA should implement better recycling program

RESPONSIBILITY: School should restructure system to meet state standards while helping environment

By Elizabeth Rogers, Brian Rudiger and Ben Gertner

The main obstacles keeping UCLA from developing a better recycling program are the very people whose job it is to implement recycling. These administrators state that a major reason not to recycle at UCLA is that separate bins are not aesthetically pleasing. This university spends $500,000 a year contracting a waste disposal company, when it would cost considerably less to implement our own comprehensive recycling program. What do these administrators have against recycling?

Most would think that as an institution of higher learning, UCLA would place a great value on being a responsible member of the community. But when it comes to its recycling program, this is far from true.

Assembly bill 939, passed in 1989, requires that, through recycling and waste reduction, the campus reduce waste sent to landfills over 1990 levels by 25 percent by 1995 and by 50 percent by 2000. To avoid violating this law, UCLA needs to rededicate itself to the process of developing a first-rate, comprehensive recycling program.

Rogers, Rudiger and Gertner are members of the UCLA Environmental Coalition.

At a time when over 90 percent of the original forests in the United States have been destroyed, and California has lost over 99 percent of its grasslands and over 85 percent of its redwoods, the need for a comprehensive recycling program has never been greater. Yet, if UCLA continues its current abysmal recycling program, the university will be in violation of the law in less than two years.

Despite the tremendous need for increased recycling, UCLA currently recycles less than 18 percent of its total waste stream. More than half of the total waste is incinerated, and the remaining 30 percent of the waste is sent to landfills. Instead of setting up separate bins around campus for various recyclables, UCLA claims to sort through trash cans and pull out recyclables. Unfortunately, this system means that many recyclables are "contaminated" by food and other trash, and the amount of waste actually recycled drops dramatically. In addition, by having only one trash can, UCLA is doing nothing to help to help educate and involve students in the process of recycling.

Under budget restrictions, ASUCLA recently abolished much of its recycling program. Minimal recycling happens in ASUCLA offices and food service locations. Despite having bins located in some of the dormitories, very little of the waste is actually recycled. The majority of waste both from ASUCLA and from on-campus housing is incinerated.

By shipping the majority of UCLA's waste away from the Westside to the predominantly Latino, low-income area of Southeast Los Angeles, where it is disposed of in potentially hazardous ways, UCLA's methods of waste disposal have also contributed to the phenomenon of "toxic racism." Toxic or environmental racism refers to the disproportionate impact of toxic pollution on communities whose residents are primarily people of color.

Incinerators are the biggest known source of dioxin, one of the most toxic chemicals, responsible for countless cases of cancer and birth defects. Dioxin finds its way through the food chain and concentrates in breast milk. Babies are exposed to 50 to 100 times more dioxin than adults, and one in 10 U.S. residents suffers from some level of developmental neurotoxicity, resulting in slower learning skills.

Despite what some in the UCLA administration will say, developing an effective recycling program at UCLA can be done. Universities and other institutions around the country have proven that comprehensive, productive recycling programs can be developed. Indeed, right here in Los Angeles, Loyola Marymount University's program recycles close to 50 percent of its waste and expects to reach 60 percent by 2000. Furthermore, Loyola's recycling program has cut the university's waste disposal costs dramatically, and by selling the materials they recycle, the program pays entirely for itself. LMU employs five students to manage its recycling program with well-paying part-time jobs. As a much larger school, UCLA would be able to offer more student jobs.

The need for recycling has never been greater. It is also essential that UCLA's waste is not disposed of in ways which contribute to environmental injustice. The UCLA Environmental Coalition is leading a campaign to encourage UCLA to improve the recycling program through a variety of means including:

Setting up separate bins around campus in which students can recycles cans and bottles.

Increasing efforts to collect and recycle paper in all university buildings.

Beginning to recycle in ASUCLA food service establishments, both pre- and post-consumer.

Using reusable materials instead of disposables wherever possible.

Selling more recycled products in the student store and using high post-consumer-content recycled paper in all offices and computer labs.

UCLA can best accomplish this goal by starting its own comprehensive recycling program. Other universities around the nation have proven that this is the best way to develop and implement a recycling program that both recycles a large percentage of waste and reduces costs to the university. We are confident that UCLA will be a leader in the field of recycling, but we need student support to get things going. Join the Environmental Coalition and help gather signatures for our "UCLA, Don't Throw It All Away" petition. whom I met in the Freshman Summer Program sponsored by the Affirmative Action Program here (now threatened by UCLA's post-209 administrative decision-making). In our class, students expressed that they hoped to learn more about their history, since their high schools didn't teach them.

I explained how revisionist history has threatened the power of traditionally male, Euro-American scholarship and how people of color have struggled since the '60s to affirm and inscribe their perspectives on the pages of history books that consistently excluded them. This struggle is more heated now than ever.

Indeed our victories, from the '60s to the struggle for the Cesar Chavez Center in 1993, are important lessons calling for a necessary militancy if we are to turn the tide on this flurry of racist legislation. As McLaren and the panelists urged, we must make personal life commitments in a struggle for our souls, to "reclaim the public sphere."

This fact alone – that people of color literally forced the doors of academia open in the late '60s – is enough to threaten the aging white elite of California. It explains why Gov. Ronald Reagan in 1970 began drastically increasing tuition at the UCs, from $100 to over $4,500 today.

The truth is, however, that people of color have arrived and are not going to be so easily moved by misleading legislation or baffling buzzwords. We have a more inclusive vision of society because our vision includes us, the "historically underrepresented."

Our politics are, in fact, for all and most likely threaten California's political order. As one of the blow-out participants stated, "La victoria nos pertenece: victory belongs to us!"

We should all know by now that if you ignore history you are bound to repeat it. Ignoring the regional history is apparently convenient to California's aging white ruling class. To everyone else it is an insult.

Responsible citizens would be wise to open their eyes and redirect the machine now being controlled by people like Connerly, Wilson, Ron Unz and the UC Regents.

As for the vehicle itself, which these people are driving at record speeds: It will most likely hit a bump in the road, if not fly off a dark cliff entirely.

ARTS & ENTERTAINMENT

In their upcoming movie "Wild Things" Neve Campbell, Kevin Bacon, Matt Dillon and Denise Richards are doing some pretty wild things. Fraught with plot twists, the film is full of back-stabbing and surprise. We thought the actors should look the part, so go ahead and dress up these paper dolls as wildly as possible. Note to the average Bruin: wild does not equal naked. Turn your entries in to Kerckoff 118 by Friday at 5 p.m. and winners will win free passes to the film as well as "Wild" stuff.

The Academy of Television Arts and Sciences honors two UCLA student filmmakers during the 19th annual College Awards

As the genial emcee reads from the list of nominees, a hush falls over the capacity crowd. At long last, one film is singled out as the best of the previous year, and the director quickly makes his way onto the large stage to accept his prize. He proceeds to thank his parents and his crew, all the while having his picture taken by photographers kneeling by the stage.

Though this scene will be replicated literally dozens of times this year at various award shows and banquets, the festivities held two nights ago at the Century Plaza Hotel in Century City had one major difference: all the winners were university students, and all were being honored for film projects produced at their schools.

The Academy of Television Arts and Sciences has been presenting College Awards for the past 19 years, in an attempt to single out worthy student efforts from around the nation and to encourage young filmmakers to keep applying their trade, despite the extreme competitiveness found in the entertainment industry.

Awards are distributed in nine categories: Music, Traditional Animation, Non-Traditional Animation, News, Sports, Magazine Shows, Comedy, Documentary and Drama. First-place winners in each category receive a $2,000 cash prize. Second-place winners receive $1,000 and third place $500. In addition to the monetary awards, first and second-place winners, including UCLA students Marc Marriott and Mark Dale Levine, also receive the Eastman Product Grant from Kodak, which provides free film stock for further projects.

FILM: Directorial debut on poker players' friendships promises positive response

By Sandy Yang
Daily Bruin Contributor

"Follow the Bitch." The title elicits giggling and perhaps a raised eyebrow or two. Knowing it is a collaborative effort of old college buddies, the name smacks of some kind of misogyny. Strange name for a movie about a woman who beats the guys at their own game.

"Follow the Bitch," the title of which actually refers to a card game, is "a comedy about this world that's traditionally male-dominated," says director/ screenwriter/producer Julian Stone, "and how their behavior changes with a woman there."

Premiering today at UCLA, "Follow the Bitch" is Stone's directorial debut. Having worked as a screenwriter for years with scripts "kicking around" in the studios, he decided to venture out on his own as a filmmaker. The movie was financed with money saved from previous scripts and the sacrifice of some valuable baseball cards and movie posters.

"You do what you've got to do," Stone laughs. "When you work for the studios for a number of years, you make a nice living, but all you're doing is producing piles of paper. The odds of something that you write actually getting made are relatively slim. I decided to go for it. I originally got into this business to do films, not create piles of paper."

Stone's persistence has taken form in the slice-of-life comedy which explores the transmogrification of the characters' views, all while playing poker.

Bill (played by Shakespearean actor Ray Porter) has been the host of the Friday-night poker games for the past 10 years when he receives startling news. Not only is his buddy Andy (Dion Luther), getting married, but he has also invited Liz (Melissa Lechner) to play, marking the first time a woman is a part of the game. The situation doesn't get better when a she beats everyone, and a battle of wits ensues between Liz and Bill.

For Lechner, playing Liz is a departure from her own life. "I have a tendency to be spacier, wackier, a little more of a head-in-the-clouds type of person," she says. "Some of my friends go see the film and say, 'Melissa, that's not you.' That's a nice compliment."

However, for Porter, playing an "irascible cynic" reminds the actor of the Bard's own plays.

"(Bill) really learns something over the night." Porter says. "He finds out that this woman is not just a better poker player, but she can match wits with anybody. You can make that comparison to 'Taming of the Shrew' or 'Much Ado about Nothing.' It's two really witty people who start out as adversaries and then recognize something in each other."

The story and the chance to work with old friends enticed the Cal Arts alums to work together despite their hectic schedules and distant locations.

"This film we did basically for the love," Porter says. "We had such a great time working on it with Julian, who is a very dear friend. We've known each other for a very long time, so it was just a great experience for that alone."

But making the film would prove to be an arduous task, especially for Porter.

"I did 'Rosencrantz and Guildenstern' in San Francisco. I finished that, drove to L.A. and the next day began shooting," Porter recalls. "Two weeks later when I wrapped at four in the morning, I got on a plane at six, landed in Ashland (Oregon) and began reading through the play I was doing here."

For others, the film was nurtured from step one, especially for Luther, who served as an actor and producer for the film.

"You look at Woody Allen and the same actors and the same crew he has worked with for years and years, and I always wondered, 'What's with that? Why wouldn't you want to branch out and go in other directions?'" Luther says. "But now having done it, I realize it's so satisfying to take relationships you already have and make them work this end."

Having completed the film, the crew still had post-production to worry about. The next hurdle would be the public's response.

"We've gotten unbelievable response," Luther says. "You write something, you show it to your friends and family. You struggle with it and labor with it. You never know when you get a group of strangers in the room – what's going to happen. I can remember standing in the back of the theater with Julian the first night we screened it, and I don't know whether the scars that I have on my arm from that night are his fingers or mine. We were both terrified."

Indeed, "Follow the Bitch" has garnered recognition and awards from festivals around the country. The possibilities seem optimistic – even for a low-budget film.

Nowadays, the term "independent film" refers to movies donning the support of major studios and a budget in the low millions. Consequently, truly independent films with a small fraction of a movie budget can expect to travail for public attention, but the cast and crew is up to the challenge.

"You fight each battle each step of the way," Luther says. "With some people, they say, 'You know, we don't have that great a film, and we really don't want to keep fighting for it.' That's not the case with us because we believe in it, and we're going to keep pushing this thing ... We are an independent film in the best sense of the word."

The cast and crew knew all too well what being in an almost no-budget film was like.

"We all crowded in Julian's apartment," Porter recalls. "The movie itself seems very close – a bunch of guys sitting around the table. Well, now you have to imagine not just a bunch of guys sitting around that table in that small room but twice as many people behind the camera doing the lights and everything."

Big Bad Voodoo Daddy, "Big Bad Voodoo Daddy," (Coolsville/EMI-Capitol) After years as one of Los Angeles' most popular local indie bands, the swingin' cats of Big Bad Voodoo Daddy have been picked up by EMI-Capitol for their major label debut.

A mix of older independent releases and material off the movie, "Swingers," which helped rocket Big Bad Voodoo Daddy's already burgeoning popularity, their self-titled album charms the pants off the listener, with its mix of well-crafted swing, lounge music and scat rhythms. While maintaining a youthful, almost punk-like mood throughout the record, BBVD clearly finds its niche within the jazzy, brassy sounds of the late '30s and '40s, and recreates that era's spirit perfectly without trying too hard to be cool and trendy. Cherry Poppin' Daddies and Squirrel Nut Zippers, they ain't.

The record features all sorts of Big Bad Voodoo Daddy swing manifestations, led by the charismatic lead singer, Scotty Morris. True swing numbers like "The Boogie Bumpers," "King of Swing" and "Mr. Pinstripe Suit" will have you reachin' for your dancin' shoes in no time. BBVD throws in some songs that deviate a little from their big-band sound, like the smooth yet rockin' "Please Baby" and the Latin-flavored "Mambo Sing." Of course, the obligatory (and rerecorded) "Swingers" songs are here, the most popular being the snazzy "You & Me & the Bottle Make Three Tonight (Baby)" and the standout "Go Daddy-O."

"BBVD" is a lively, entertaining album sure to spice up any party or occasion, even if yer not the big swing fan. But for those of you that appreciate quality music, their top-notch, mostly energetic, musical delivery will not disappoint. Mike Prevatt A-

The Bogmen, "Closed Captioned Radio," (Arista) My, how pretty the case is. My, how slick the overlay tracks on the opening song are. My, how the Bogmen have grown from being a funky, low key, one album, East Coast-club band to being a two-album, industry packaged commercial product.

But that's being a bit harsh. The album still reflects the lyrical wizardry of Bill Campion, who seems to have opted to go by the "cooler" stage name of Vic Thrill. For instance, the tune "Highway of Shame" has him wailing "It's a nice day out for a stroll in time and space/ memories have married and they've laid their eggs/ right angles held captive by a square/ it takes four to tango and a steady hand."

Yet Campion's, rather, Thrill's, treacherously cartoony voice, fluctuating between octaves like a yodeling bartender antsy to take center stage, leaves something to be desired. Also, the bouncy congo drum beats and rattling melodies of the band's first album, "Life Begins at 40 Million," seem less proliferative on this sharper set of songs.

Still, the Bogmen manage to rekindle some fun on the catchy track, "Mad Larry," which has you bobbing, "It'll happen, it'll happen," oh so reassuredly. Also, the song "Dark Waltz" somewhat rekindles the group's ability to usher in a strange sounding piece with the gusto of shrieking vampires at a cocktail party, drawing attention to the seemingly light work's heavier meanings.

All in all, the Bogmen are quite down for the count. However, it doesn't seem that "Closed Captioned Radio" will be the band's escalator to mainstream exposure. And one shouldn't buy the album at full price. Wait until it meets with the bargain bin after about a month, where it'll be resting next to their last album. Vanessa VanderZanden C+

Libido, "Killing Some Dead Time," (Velvel) Look at Matchbox 20 and Radiohead, and you think you've got polar opposites. Blend the two together, and you've got Libido.

This album definitely plays on the commercial sound of today's American pop, but the melodies and use of recording-studio special effects on the vocals gives a good, old-fashioned Radiohead-esque sound.

The basic attraction of this album lies in the band's ability to sweep the listener into a song with a catchy, melodic introduction. Most of the album takes on a more mellow feel, but in a few areas, a wall of instrumental noise seems to spit from the speakers, and you start to feel a drone in your ears. Thankfully, they always seem to follow these pitfalls with an excellent sound in the next song.

Although Libido has found a sound that could definitely reach radio waves and Billboard charts with certain songs, not much of what they are doing is very original, and most of the songs sound strangely alike. Still, the catchy guitar introductions and sweet harmonies are definitely something a fan of today's pop movement should hear. Danielle Myer A-

Fretblanket, "Home Truths From Abroad," (Polydor) They aren't the first English band in hopes of making it big in the U.S. music industry, and they certainly won't be the last. They also definitely won't find the same success here that Bush or Blur has, but Fretblanket's new album, "Home Abroad," contains a few selections worth a shot at decent airtime on the radio. Electric guitar overload and catchy rhythms dominate English rock's newest hope for stateside success.

The first half of the album contains great alt-rock picks swimming in a sea of angsty lyrics and hard-hittin' guitar choruses. The first track, "Into The Ocean," marks the album's best single by far. In fact, its new video's success on MTV's "Twelve Angry Viewers" gives the song a well-deserved chance to be heard (and seen). Compelling drives move songs "Hammer and Tongues" and "Black Tambourine" through successful melodies.

Unfortunately, the second half doesn't carry as well. Too much of a good thing gets old fast. By then you've heard what the band is capable of, and there isn't much left to look forward to, except the same atypical alternative style over and over again. Our only relief from the monotony comes from the carrying melody of acoustic number "Killer in A Former Life." Songs such as "Green As Green" grow quite dull and lifeless compared to those sticking treats from before.

Fretblanket creates decent tunes, but in terms of creativity, the band still has a lot to learn. Michelle Zublate B

'The Big Lebowski' doubles over in its own humor

FILM: Coen Brothers' project's attempt to appeal to sentiment, funny-bone hints of the absurd

By Tommy Nguyen
Daily Bruin Contributor

The pop success of "Fargo" has made "The Big Lebowski" one of the most anticipated movies of the year, and for Coen-heads everywhere anticipation was something we all had to endure: the delayed release date and titillating genius of the teaser trailer have been blue-balling us for months now.

Well, the movie's here, and somehow that's just about all one can say about it: it's here. Much like the film's unlikely hero – a slovenly doobie brother named "the Dude" – "The Big Lebowski," no matter how amiably amusing its presence is, merely takes up couch space when everything's been cashed. Toward the end you just want to slap the meandering nonsense out of the movie and say, "Dude, will you quit jerking off and finish your story?!"

> "The Big Lebowski"... has a certain slacker charm that nudges us in the rib, even when we're not laughing.

Then again, it's hard to slap a harmless stoner who just wants to entertain, and that's why "The Big Lebowski" also has a certain slacker charm that nudges us in the rib, even when we're not laughing. Despite its failures (primarily, that the laughs run out), the movie is no blot on the Coen Brothers' resume, and so far there's only been one (the frigidly plastic "Hudsucker Proxy").

But what's so admirable about the Coen Brothers in their latest project is their willingness to put up their dukes a bit to challenge that constant knock against them: that they give us a bunch of stylistic eye candy to hide the fact that they only have lumps of coal for our hearts. Yes, "Lebowski" doesn't seem to be another circus show for the Coen Brothers' high-wire camera and lighting acrobatics (like the ones, breathtaking as they are, in "Blood Simple"). More impressively, there doesn't seem to be a mean bone anywhere in "Lebowski," and there's a sweetness to its much ado that makes it the friendliest Coen Brothers film all around.

Surely the fuzzy-wuzzy feel we get from "Lebowski" is because of the Dude (a truly funkified Jeff Bridges), a stoned and de-boned heap of a human being, "quite possibly the laziest man in L.A.," who walks around the supermarket in his bathrobe and likes to spend his time in the gutter lanes with his bowling buddies, Walter (an almost too-generous John Goodman) and Donny (Steve Buscemi). Strangely, American audiences tend to love characters who, no matter how special they are, embrace or strive for averageness ("Good Will Hunting," "Forrest Gump"), and likewise the Dude offers the same comfort: He's a happy martyr for mediocrity who will continue "to take it easy for all of us sinners."

The Dude has a hard time taking it easy when a duo of thugs break into his Venice apartment, dunk his head in his toilet and urinate on his rug. The men think the Dude is Jeff Lebowski, whose wife apparently owes them money in some porno-sordid way. By birth (only by birth), the Dude's name is Jeff Lebowski, but they've got the wrong dude: the Jeff Lebowski they want is a Pasadena millionaire.

Well, by the Dude's logical estimation, the big Lebowski owes him a rug, and so he ventures to confront his grossly refracted doppelganger. Eventually, the big Lebowski offers him more than that; someone has kidnapped his beach-blanket-bimbo wife (and a kidnapping is always a bong-water fresh idea for the Coen Brothers), and he'll pay the Dude handsomely to play ball with her ransomers.

No sweat, thinks the Dude, that is until his sweaty bowling chum Walter – a doughboy-lovable NRA mascot who relates everything to 'Nam – becomes his bumbling cohort. When Walter's plot to finagle the ransom money goes awry, the Dude becomes the target of an Even if a bigger budget were feasible, Stone wouldn't change a thing, though Luther's one suggestion is more M&M's. Stone's next project, may take place in an even more confined location.

He says, "If you give yourself the challenge, then it forces you to be creative and make it interesting."

So can we expect a Woody Allen-esque type of casting for the next film?

"Absolutely," Porter laughs. "Just tell Julian to sit at that computer and bang out some more great scripts."

FILM: "Follow the Bitch" premieres tonight at the James Bridges Theater at 7:30 p.m. The free screening will be followed by a Q&A with Director Julian Stone and actress Melissa Lechner.

onslaught of typically absurd Coenstituents, which include a Sprockets revival of terrorizing German nihilists (Flea of "Red Hot Chili Peppers" makes an appearance as one of them) and Lebowski's plotting daughter Maud (Julianne Moore in staccato flare), who literally flies into the movie as a bat out of feminist hell, an artist whose paintings have been described as "extremely vaginal."

With the lowbrow tandem of the Dude and Walter cooking up most of the mayhem in "Lebowski," the Coen Brothers are once again serving up hot dogs and potato salad as comic manna: on the movie screen the Coens have become the prized fiduciaries of smaller-than-life Americans, and their familiar type of trailer-park humanity is constantly present in the Dude's struggle to reclaim his small, unobtrusive corner of the cosmos. And this movie comes at the heels of "Fargo" – the most hearty slice of Middle America the Coens have dished out so far – and yet be aware that "Lebowski" shares just about nothing with "Fargo", whose restrained, deadpan, "based on a true story" (it's not) attitude makes it a Coen Brothers anomaly altogether.

In "Lebowski," the filmmakers are somewhat back to their signature fantasia of mythico-poetic screwballing, the kind first introduced in "Raising Arizona" and mercilessly hammered in "Barton Fink." We see a drugged-out Busby Berkeley dance number – where the Dude flies through the city's skyline with an inane Lois Lane look on his face – along with other scenes so flamboyantly wacky (such as a marmot being used as an attack dog by the nihilists) that, even though the Coens have put a leash on their spastic camera, their relentless cerebral slapstick becomes a source of overkill anyway.

> In "Lebowski," the Coen Brothers are once again serving up hot dogs and potato salad as comic manna.

What's even worse, it's overkill in a story that almost has no life to kill. The whole scheme with the kidnapping is so dull that it's exhausting just knowing that the movie's about a kidnapping and, judging from the film's half-assed resolution, the filmmakers were probably just as bored with it as we are. And unlike the rest of the Coen Brothers' films, there is such an utter lack of geographical specificity – essential to the comedy of both "Fargo" and "Raising Arizona" are the daffy idiosyncrasies of their respective tribes. "Lebowski's" voice-over intro (narrated by Sam Elliot, the low-rent John Wayne of our generation) goes into this whole hoopla about what kind of city Los Angeles is, and yet the Coen Brothers do nothing with Los Angeles; the story could have taken place in any part of the country, and no one would be the wiser.

Except of course, the Coen Brothers, who are wise to just about everything there is in the world. But at their worst, it's entirely their world: what we feel in "The Big Lebowski" is a couple of gifted filmmakers mostly getting high off their own hyperbolic ingenuities, and then once in a while, one of the brothers will quit his horse-playing and say, almost regrettably, "Oh look, we've got company." No doubt most of us would love to be in their company anyway, no matter what private stash of crack they're smoking. Still, an important thing for the Coen Brothers to know about their audiences is that a contact high doesn't last very long.

ed Nancy Cartwright ("The Simpsons"), Larry Carroll ("CBS News"), Amy Pietz ("Caroline in the City"), Victoria Rowell ("Young and the Restless") and special-effects expert John Dykstra ("Jurassic Park").

The hope is that the effort of the Academy will enable young filmmakers to continue working, which in turn allows them more opportunities to succeed in Hollywood and beyond.

"Although we are best known for the Prime Time Emmys, the College Awards is one of our most important events," said Academy President Meryl Marshall. "Educational services are key to bringing new voices into the industry."

All in all, 344 eligible films were sent to the Academy judges for consideration from 135 universities nationwide. Out of these films, only six could ever become first-place winners.

The first-place awards went to "Suburban Monogamy" (USC) for Comedy, "Deo Gratias" (University of Oklahoma) for Music, "Texas and the Death Penalty" (University of Texas/Austin) for Documentary, "On the Beat" (UC Berkeley) for News Magazine, "Smoke" (California Institute of the Arts) for Traditional Animation, and "Pets" (USC) for Non-Traditional Animation.

As well, "Texas and the Death Penalty" and its director Tassos Rigopuolos were awarded the prestigious Seymour Bricker College Award, given annually to the College Award winner who best demonstrates a humanitarian concern. The Bricker Award also comes with a $2,000 prize.

All the first and second-place winners were screened at the Academy's office on Monday, in a presentation hosted by longtime film critic Charles Champlin. This event – open to the public – was designed to provide a potentially larger audience for student films.

Among those winning second-place honors were two UCLA students: Marriott for his dramatic film "The Snow Child" and Levine for his traditional animation "Unborn Baby Blues."

Marriott, whose film career is expanding with several possible features on the horizon, made "The Snow Child" with help from the James Bridges Foundation earlier this year. He hopes to use this film to expand his career in motion pictures.

> "Every time a student makes a film, it helps all of us. There is plenty of room in this industry for everyone."
> Marc Marriott
> UCLA filmmaker

"You have to get a lot of things up in the air to ever get a film made," Marriott said. "Right now I have a few solid projects, and hopefully, I'll actually get a feature made sometime this year."

Among the potential projects Marriott has in the works is a translation of a John Updike novel, with a screenplay authored by accomplished director Jack Larson ("The China Syndrome") and a studio comedy about rock climbing. Marriott's success, as well as the good fortune of other collegiate directors, can only help other young people who are trying to break into the business of movie-making.

"Every time a student makes a film, it helps all of us," Marriott said. "There is plenty of room in this industry for everyone, and I have a whole lot of colleagues with a lot of talent."

The recognition of this talent was the ultimate goal for many a Sunday night. After the last award was handed out and the crowds made their way to the exit, many reflected that the media of television and film rested on their shoulders.

Presenter Larry Carroll was one of those people who took part in the ceremony to advance the medium to which he has dedicated his life.

"The art and science of television will all be advanced by what these young people are doing, and I am very, very impressed," Carroll said.

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make your ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

Next year you could be pushing paper for a Goliath.
We're hiring Davids.
Public Interest Career Positions
The Goliaths of today are polluting our environment, cheating their customers and corrupting the democratic process. If you would rather be a David than push paper for a Goliath, apply for a position with the state PIRGs, the State Public Interest Research Groups. We were started by Ralph Nader and we stand up for the public interest.

We're hiring full-time professional staff to help us organize, research, lobby and wage grassroots campaigns for the public interest.

1300 Campus Recruitment

Freightliner Corporation is the North American market leader in the design, development and manufacture of a complete line of technologically-advanced heavy and medium-duty trucks and specialty vehicles. We have the following opportunities available:

Sales Applications Engineers
If you are a recent college graduate or in the last year of your mechanical or manufacturing degree program, you may be eligible for our training program for Sales Applications Engineers at our Portland, Oregon Headquarters. In this program, we will teach you how to assist and consult with customers, dealers, and field staff on specific applications and models. You will also inspect designated TSO's for engineering feasibility and provide technical feedback to field sales staff. We are looking for energetic, outgoing individuals who excel at customer service and have a talent for problem solving and troubleshooting. We will also be interviewing students, with at least junior standing, for our summer internships in our Sales Application Engineering Department.

We will be on the UCLA campus Friday, March 13th, at the Engineering Placement office from 9:15am-5:00pm. Stop by and see us. You can also fax your resume in advance to: (503) 735-5299. In addition to an excellent work environment, Freightliner offers a competitive compensation and benefits package. We are an equal opportunity employer. M/F/D/V.

Good Head!

See Dick.
See Dick's cap.
Recent studies show MOST UCLA students drink no more than 4 when they party. So what? Students who drink 4 or less have better love lives, are happier with their relationships, and have "Good Heads". Good thinkin' Dick!

Meet Dick. No he's not on the swim team, and that's not a dunce cap. Actually Dick is a 4.0 student with a good head on his shoulders. Even though Dick has been engaged in some social intercourse, a couple of beers, a shot and a blow job, he has not lost his head and forgotten his headdress. And if you can't tell by this photo, this particular headgear is quite a head shrinker, O.K. so he never quite learned what bone is connected to what, but he deserves an "A" for effort. After all he's head over heels for the head cheerleader, his head phones are blown, and he's trying to head off the head master [who incidentally got a good head start]. The pressures of this head strong young man have not caused him to charge head first into a heady drink-a-thon. No, not this Dick. He knows over doing it would only cause him a huge headache and a trip straight to the head for a wrestling match with the toilet. [And nobody likes to be in a toilet's headlock.] Why if he were to head up a real booze fest, his new headquarters might just be located six feet under a headstone! Heads up! Most UCLA students drink four or less when they party. Some don't drink at all. So use your head and remember, when you've done 4, you're done.

While he has always been a model of consistency for the Bruins, he has also been a model of consternation for the fans. They can't decide whether to love him for his amazing athletic ability or despise him because of his sullen facial expressions and body language.

For four years, Henderson has regularly been among the team leaders in points, rebounds and blocks.

But he is also far and away the team leader in frowns, scowls and sneers.

And whether it's fair or not, that's what many people will remember about him.

Some may realize that he has been on the first-team all-conference team twice, was just named an honorable mention All-American Monday, and stands at ninth on the all-time UCLA point list and 13th on the rebound charts.

But virtually everybody is well aware that he cries at the referees, pouts when something goes wrong and often just exudes complete ambivalence.

And he hears all about it. The thing is, he just doesn't care.

"It doesn't bother me at all," he said. "Because what they are saying is like totally opposite of why I make the face, so it's like I don't even bother to acknowledge their comments at all.

"Usually it's because I'm just getting down on myself, and getting focused or if I don't like a particular play. I'm kind of a perfectionist on the court."

It's not as if he likes the insinuations that his expressions promote, but that's just the way he is.

"That's just his personality. What you see is what it's always been," his dad, Milton, said. "We've talked a lot of times about facial expressions and body language and the look like the moping look. In terms of facial expression, people want him to be Johnny Rah-rah or something, but that's just not him."

Ever since high school, when he used to wave obscene gestures at fans and talk back to coaches, Henderson's on-court behavior has been a hot topic of conversation.

Every step of the way he has been told by his parents, his high school coach and now Lavin that his image suffers with every extra glare, additional mope and each subsequent sigh.

But most importantly, with every additional complaint to a referee, he is that much more unlikely to get the call to go his way the next time down the floor.

"We've talked about that a lot," Lavin said. "But practically, I just don't want him wasting energy and emotion on something he can't control. I'd rather him channel that energy into something that is more conducive and productive."

And in fact, Henderson is finally understanding where his coaches and his parents have been coming from all his life. Well, to a certain extent, anyway.

When he watches himself on television, he often asks himself why he looks like he does.

"I don't really like that about myself," he said. "It's like it should be totally different when it comes to that. Sometimes you don't really know how you react. I've been working on it as much as I can."

And it's not just talk; he has practiced it on the court.

On one possession in last Thursday's 102-94 victory over Arizona State, Henderson was called for a charging foul against ASU's Mike Batiste, even though it was obvious to everyone in the building that the Sun Devil had taken a flop to fool the referee.

"After that I just told the ref that they were really flopping down there, and I came (to the ref) in a way I've been working on," Henderson said. "I wasn't just yelling at him and going off on him."

A few minutes later, the other ASU forward Bobby Lazor took a flop, no foul was called, and Henderson scored an easy lay-up.

"It worked in my favor. That game I was kind of laughing every foul off."

It was no coincidence that the game was one of his best of the season. He had a double-double by halftime, and finished with 25 points and a career-high 16 rebounds.

"Yeah, when you just play your game and ignore the refs and don't get involved in that sort of thing, it just works out better for you," he said.

OK, so he's working on limiting his complaints to referees, but what about all the other negative connotations that arise from his sighs, frowns and such – like popularity?

He is the most versatile Bruin; He can play any of five positions. He is their most intelligent player: Lavin says Henderson has the highest "basketball IQ" of any player he has coached in his 10 years of Division I basketball experience.

But by no means is he the most publicized, nor is he the most well-known throughout the country – that "honor" would be bestowed upon Toby Bailey, freshman Baron Davis or others.

And that is what Henderson doesn't mind. He would just as soon be the one left alone. And that's why he could care less what others think of him.

"It's kind of refreshing, actually, in this era where everybody is so concerned with their perception," Lavin said. "Everybody is so image-conscious now that it's kind of nice to have a player that cares less.

"He's not trying to manipulate the media or manipulate the team to try and draw attention himself. He likes to remain in the background and he doesn't have an ego where he needs to be front and center."

Though an interview with Henderson is no longer like pulling teeth, talking to the media is just about the last thing Henderson would choose to do. He would just as soon be spared all the superfluous distractions.

After last Tuesday's practice, which is one of only two open practices to the media each week, Henderson refused to talk.

And Sunday, when a press conference was held after the NCAA Tournament pairings were announced, he could be heard approaching the table muttering (only half to himself) the hope – or perhaps, a demand – that nobody ask him a question.

Then, when reporters were allowed to approach the table for one-on-one questions, he excused himself for a bathroom break – and never returned.

Meanwhile, Bailey, Davis, Kris Johnson and Earl Watson were inundated with cameras and notepads recording their every word.

Some – like ASU's Batiste, who was victimized by Henderson's wide array of moves – say avoiding the media is his "problem."

"He is one of the most underrated players in the county," ASU's Batiste, who was dominated by Henderson Thursday, said. "He's quiet, he needs to be on ESPN more, but all the players know what he can do."

But that's just how Henderson likes it. If it were up to him, he would never be the center of media attention.

"Sometimes it comes back to haunt you," he said. "People place all these expectations on you one night, and if you don't meet them, they're not your friends the next day. I don't want to be like that."

And that's why he doesn't care if his actions on the court are misunderstood.

As long as his teammates and coaches appreciate him, Henderson is happy. And his teammates and coaches? Oh, boy, do they love him – frowning or not.

"People always talk about how he's always frowning or whatever, but a lot of times things haven't gone his way. I didn't know there was a law against smiling," Johnson said. "It seems like people always want to ridicule him. But he is an intense competitor – one of the most intense I have ever seen.

"What I see most on J.R.'s face is a plain look like 'I'm just playing ball, I am just out here.'"

Henderson is considered one of the team leaders.

And it's not just on the stat board, where in 30 games he has led the team in points 12 times, rebounds 14 times, steals 5 times and even led the team in assists once.

Henderson is also considered to be among the most important "locker room" leaders. Although he is not a yeller and a screamer – rather, he leads by example – when he does talk, the Bruins pay attention.

"J.R., I think, is just the overall leader," guard Davis said. "He is the guy who, when he speaks, everyone listens, and by his play – well his play just does so much for us."

Henderson is a good leader and a great athlete. He plays hard and is one of the smartest on the court.

But his smiles are rare, and thus public criticism is prevalent.

Does it really matter?

Not to the team and not to Henderson. He can just shrug it off and walk away – without a comment – then go score his 20 points and get his eight rebounds.

And make everybody else smile.

which may be partially due to the fact that their normal lead-off hitter and starting second-baseman Laurie Fritz is out with a dislocated shoulder. Replacing her was freshman Casey Hirawiwa, who went one for three with one run.

Offensive staple Nicole Odom had a tough day at the plate, going one for three.

"I was a little disappointed in myself offensively, but I'm glad that we won as a team," Odom said.

Defensively, however, the Bruins came out on top, committing only one error and making several spectacular plays, including a head-first dive by Hirawiwa to get the out at first at the top of the 10th inning.

The win comes after the Bruins finished the Fresno State Classic 1-3, losing games to Tennessee, Indiana and No. 5 Fresno State. The team did pull out a 6-3 win against No. 22 Kansas thanks to the pitching of Erin Weiler (6-2).

her extrascholastic competition experience includes the '96 Olympic trials and '97 World University Games in Sicily, Italy.

"Like every other swimmer, I've always wanted to go to the Olympics ever since I was kid," Etter said. "As you get older, you realize it's a lot harder than you thought. Actually making and going to the trials is huge.

"One that might even top that was the silver medal we won at the World University Games. Swimming for the United States, representing my country, being with three other great girls in another country – that was top. It was like a whole bunch of goals reached at once."

It's hard to imagine such a successful competitor being afraid of challenges, but that was the case not so many years ago. Diving into a Division I program with little previous experience, Etter remembers a time when her nerves were less like steel and more like Jell-o.

"I came in really timid as a freshman, sort of fearful and scared of challenging myself. I used to pray a lot because I'd get so scared before races that I couldn't breathe. It's such an involuntary thing. I was so tied up inside. The last thing I wanted to do was stop in the middle of a race because I couldn't breathe."

Over the years, Etter learned to overcome her fears through gaining experience in the swimming program. She also gives credit to her faith and a lot of praying.

"I just say, 'OK, Lord, let's do this.' Faith helped me a lot. And my coach, Cyndi, has given me a lot of room to grow as a person and as a swimmer. I'm thankful for the program 'cause it has allowed me to become someone a lot stronger inside. You know, in the long run, that's what really counts."

Head coach Cyndi Gallagher attests to Etter's improvement.

"Lindsay came into the program with a lot of potential but little experience," Gallagher said. "No one in swimming knew much about her, but I knew her high school coach. I watched her swim and at that point, I knew she was going to be good. She came in here and has not stopped improving. She's really done well in our swimming program, which gets swimmers to improve year after year."

As the NCAA Championships approach, Etter works to get even better. This is the event that she's been waiting for. This is the event where she will try to lower her own school record again.

"The NCAAs is the meet that I think about all year long," Etter said.

"It's a one-time deal, one-time try."

It will also be her last swimming competition as an NCAA-eligible Bruin. She has a couple of extrascholastic swimming races planned after the season, but realizing her college experience is coming to an end, she says she'll shift her focus to her career. She's leaning toward becoming a kindergarten teacher, but whatever she does, Etter hopes it'll be meaningful.

heart into and motivates me as much as swimming does. Besides swimming, I really haven't had the chance to try other facets in life. I'm excited to see where else I can ask myself to give a hundred percent."

All her years at UCLA have made Lindsay Etter a mature, profound, gracious woman. She has come a long way.

She stares nostalgically at the vacant swimming pool. Calm, silent and reflective. Peaceful. Strange.

Just moments ago, the same pool was invigorated with lively splashes of Etter and her teammates.

After a moment of quiet self-reminiscing, words finally flow out of her mouth.

"I'm sure there's more to come when swimming's not here, but it'll sure be different without those early mornings of practice sessions. I'll miss the camaraderie and teammates. I'll miss being so driven. Pushing the limit, testing myself mentally and physically, hearing the heartbeat in my ear. It's hard and it's draining, but it's exciting at the same time because you walk away with so much satisfaction out of a workout.

"It's funny how much you can learn swimming. I remember my freshman year when Cyndi kicked me out of practice because I couldn't do the butterfly right. I kept doing one-armed butterfly instead. She finally said, 'Don't come back till you're ready to swim.'

"It's so funny to look back at that now and how far I've come along."

Montgomerie gets a rise out of U.S. fans

REPUTATION: Outspoken golfer strives to obtain first win in America

By Ron Sirak
The Associated Press

Give Colin Montgomerie a break. The outspoken Scotsman is the whipping boy of American golf fans mostly because, well, he's outspoken. How about that for irony?

Fewer athletes talk – particularly when they become rich – and here's one of the best taking his lumps because he speaks his mind.

"I don't think it's right to be false and be accepted that way," Montgomerie said last week at Doral. "I think I am who I am, hopefully, and that's the way it is."

Montgomerie said at the Ryder Cup that the Valderrama course didn't suit Tiger Woods' game. Anyone want to argue with that assessment?

He said any of the 12 Europeans could beat Woods.

Shouldn't he feel that way and didn't Costantino Rocca – who was working in a box factory when he was Tiger's age – defeat Woods in singles play on Sunday?

Montgomerie said Brad Faxon was distracted by his divorce. That was not a delicate observation, but Faxon's play proved it accurate.

"I have an opinion about things," Montgomerie said last week. "I have aired them in the past and I'll air them in the future."

Maybe the U.S. team needed the same kind of verbal leader.

"Europe won the Ryder Cup because their young players played better than our young players," said a confidant of one of the young Americans.

Perhaps Montgomerie helped lift the confidence of his young teammates.

True, when things are not going well, Montgomerie does come off as a whiner. But he cares. What's wrong with that? Caring is a huge part of the complicated mix that makes up a champion.

Woods frequently draws gasps from his gallery when he bangs a club off the ground or yells an obscenity. At times, Woods reacts to an iron shot that lands 25 feet from the hole as if he has just hit the worst shot imaginable.

> Montgomerie was greeted at Doral by an article in Sports Illustrated that ... said "many fans see the pasty Scot as a first-class jerk."

Yet it is all seen as part of his passion.

Let Montgomerie express dissatisfaction and he is called a crybaby. It is as if people go out of their way to slam him.

Montgomerie was greeted at Doral by an article in Sports Illustrated that called him "the Goon from Troon, golf's Gael-force windbag" and said "many fans see the pasty Scot as a first-class jerk."

He was more baffled at the attack than angry or hurt.

At 34, Montgomerie is at the peak of his game, leading the European Tour money list for a record five consecutive years.

Since 1992, he has two seconds, a third and a 10th in the U.S. Open and a second in the PGA Championship, losing both the PGA and the U.S. Open in playoffs. The misconception is that Montgomerie blew those majors.

Montgomerie made birdies on the last three holes and shot a final-round 65 at Riviera to make the playoff with Steve Elkington in the 1995 PGA and lost to a 20-foot birdie putt on the first extra hole.

He was runner-up to Ernie Els last year in the U.S. Open at Congressional because Els hit a perfect 5-iron to an extremely difficult pin on the next-to-last hole.

"You put that down to nerves and not my ball flight," Montgomerie said about his approach to the same pin that drifted right, setting up a fatal bogey.

How refreshingly honest. He admitted he was nervous.

Montgomerie shot a 69 in the final round at Congressional and his 70.92 scoring average in the U.S. Open is second only to the 70.32 by Els in this decade. In six U.S. Opens, Montgomerie's final rounds have been two 68s, a 69, two 70s and a 72.

Only in the playoff at Oakmont with Els and Loren Roberts in the 1994 U.S. Open, when Montgomerie shot a 42 on the front nine, was he not up to the pressure of the day.

Montgomerie is 0-for-45 in PGA Tour events. But the nine times he led or was within five strokes of the lead going to the final round he averaged 70.11 and never shot higher than 72.

> "My goal this year as it has been every time I've come over here (the United States) is to win a PGA Tour event."
> Colin Montgomerie
> Professional golfer

"My goal this year as it has been every time I've come over here is to win a PGA Tour event," Montgomerie said.

"I think I have to say that in complete fairness that the competition is stiffer here," he said about not winning yet in America.

Well put, Monty.

"From the crowds to the way that the whole thing is run, it's a fabulous, fabulous tour you have here," Montgomerie said. "And hopefully people realize that."

And Colin Montgomerie is an excellent golfer who is not a bad guy.

Hopefully people realize that, too.

Kings 4, Coyotes 3

Rob Blake wanted to make sure the Los Angeles Kings weren't swarmed by the Phoenix Coyotes the way they were last time.

Blake provided a goal and an assist to spark a four-goal first period and the Kings held on to beat the slumping Coyotes 4-3 Tuesday night.

Jason Morgan, Ray Ferraro and Glen Murray also scored for the Kings, who won for the 13th time in their last 19 games (13-3-3). Los Angeles opened an 11-point lead over Phoenix for fifth place in the Western Conference.

Rick Tocchet, Cliff Ronning and John Slaney scored for the Coyotes, who are winless in their last 10 games (0-8-2) dating back to a 5-2 victory Jan. 31 at Toronto.

Phoenix was without Keith Tkachuk, who missed his second consecutive game with a groin injury, and also lost Jeremy Roenick to a game misconduct penalty late in the first period.

Frederic Chabot made 12 saves for the Kings before he was injured at 4:29 of the second period when Phoenix's Oleg Tverdovsky fell on his right leg, spraining Chabot's right knee. Chabot had extended his leg awkwardly when he left the crease to redirect a loose puck. Jamie Storr replaced Chabot, who is listed as day-to-day, and made 27 saves.

Nikolai Khabibulin surrendered the four first-period goals on Los Angeles' first seven shots, and finished with five saves on nine shots before he was benched in favor of Jimmy Waite to begin the second period. Waite, making his first appearance since Jan. 9, made 11 saves.

Morgan, playing in his third game since being recalled from Springfield of the American Hockey League, opened the scoring 47 seconds into the game when he beat Khabibulin with a short wrist shot for his first career NHL goal.

Ferraro followed with his goal at 4:09 and Blake extended the lead to 3-0 on the Kings' fourth shot when he beat Khabibulin on a slap shot from the top of the right circle. Murray capped the outburst at 15:09 when he flipped a short wrist shot over Khabibulin's right shoulder.

Less than a minute after Murray's goal, Khabibulin was greeted with a sarcastic round of applause for stopping a long clearing pass a few feet in front of the Phoenix goal.

Tocchet scored at 13:34 of the second period when he beat Storr on a rebound for the Coyotes' second power-play goal in their last 43 opportunities. Ronning scored his first goal since Jan. 21, a span of 24 games, at 7:26 of the third period when he took a pass from Stapleton and beat Storr from the low slot.

Slaney pulled the Coyotes within a goal when he blasted a shot from the top of the left circle.

Angels 9, Mariners 8

Damon Mashore went 5-for-6 with three RBIs and Ben Molina hit a go-ahead double in the 10th inning Tuesday as the Anaheim Angels overcame a five-run deficit to beat the Seattle Mariners 9-8.

Mashore, who scored the winning run after reaching against Andres Beruman, had tied the score with a two-out triple off Andrew Lorraine in the eighth.

Anaheim's Darin Erstad was 3-for-3 with an RBI, two runs scored and had one of the Angels' five stolen bases. The Angels had 17 hits, two each by Patrick Lennon and Gary Thurman.

Pat Listach went 2-for-3 with a leadoff homer in the first and three RBIs. David Segui and Glenallen Hill had two hits each.

UConn player may be wrongly credited as school's top scorer

RECORD: ESPN The Magazine creates conundrum while NCAA, teams involved play down report

By Christine Hanley
The Associated Press

HARTFORD, Conn. – Trying to figure out whether Nykesha Sales is Connecticut's top scorer is becoming about as simple as mathematical pi.

The premiere issue of ESPN The Magazine will report in its debut edition Wednesday that the staged basket that put Sales in the record books may have been for naught because she was wrongly credited for two points in an earlier game at Seton Hall.

However, Seton Hall – which didn't find out about the possible scoring discrepancy until Tuesday – said it will stand by the box score it kept for its Jan. 22 game against UConn that gave Sales 25 points.

"That's what our stat crew put down and that's what we're standing by," said Maria Wozniak, a spokeswoman for Seton Hall's athletic department.

So that means that as far as the Pirates, the Huskies and the NCAA are concerned, the latest equation presented by The Magazine adds up only to more headaches.

For now, it appears Sales will keep the already controversial school scoring record of 2,178 points – until another player breaks it.

"This is so unbelievable how one collegiate career record is taking on this life of its own," said Jim Wright, director of statistics for the NCAA. "I can't believe it."

The Magazine, acting on a tip, reviewed a film of the UConn-Seton Hall game and found that a layup made by Kelly Hunt was incorrectly put on the books as a basket for Sales.

It would have been a harmless oversight, the story goes on to say, had Sales not ruptured her Achilles tendon in the next-to-last game of the regular season, two points shy of the record, setting the stage for the infamous gift shot.

Sales, hobbled by her career-ending injury, took an uncontested layup after the tap in the Villanova-UConn game, eclipsing Kerry Bascom's scoring record and sparking a national debate about the integrity of women's basketball.

The Magazine concludes that Sales was actually four points shy of the record when she took that shot, and therefore the well-meaning gesture and the subsequent furor were "for naught."

Reporter Steve Wulf, who is also executive editor of The Magazine, questions in his story what will happen with the record now that the discrepancy has been uncovered.

But the question appeared to be moot by Tuesday, a day before the story hit the newsstands. ESPN News, which aired the story in the afternoon to promote the magazine's report, called Seton Hall, UConn and the NCAA for reaction.

And Seton Hall, which had not been called before the article was written, said it would not change its statistics. As the host of the game, the university has the final say, unless there is a dispute with the opponent, the NCAA said.

"It's up to Seton Hall," Wright said. "It's not even a case where we would get involved in, especially since it's a school record."

Wright said there was only one instance he could recall in his 23 years at the NCAA where the governing body of college athletics got involved, and that was a Division III rushing record. He said the organization would have to start a whole new unit if it started dealing with every statistical debate.

Wright, as well as both schools – and even Wulf – note that official scorers are not infallible, and that possibly, Sales may not have been credited for points that she scored in her 137 games.

"From a statistical standpoint, this is not a big deal; it happens all the time," Wright said.

MEN'S TENNIS

UCLA will host Wisconsin today at 1:30 p.m. at the Los Angeles Tennis Center.

The Bruins fell from No. 2 to No. 10 in the recent Rolex Collegiate Rankings.

The Bruins and the Badgers have only met once since 1967 – a Bruin victory.

This will be the Bruins' last match in Southern California until April 17, as they head out on a six-game Pac-10 road trip.

The UCLA doubles teams had a solid showing at the Pacific Coast Doubles Tournament March 5-8.

UCLA's No. 1 team of Matt Breen and Jean-Noel Grinda did not run into a red light until the quarterfinals. The red came from the Stanford No. 1 team of Bob Bryan and Mike Bryan, the tournament's No. 1 seed, who beat the Bruins 6-2, 7-6 (3).

Alex Decret and Noah Newman also saw Cardinal red, this time in the round of 16. Stanford's No. 2 Ryan Wolters and Paul Goldstein eliminated Decret and Newman, 6-2, 6-2.

UCLA's No. 3 team of Vince Allegre and Chris Sands advanced to the quarterfinals, where they met USC's duo of Kyle Spencer and Roman Kukal. The No. 3 seed defeated Allegre and Sands, 6-4, 6-2.

Allegre and Sands upset the No. 5 seed, San Diego State's Frank Morgan and Alexander Waske, en route to the quarterfinals.

Jamison headlines first team All-America

COLLEGE HOOPS: Media also picks talented pairs from Kansas, Arizona

By Jim O'Connell
The Associated Press

Antawn Jamison was by himself – as a North Carolina Tar Heel and as the top vote-getter on the AP All-America team.

Joining the North Carolina junior forward on the first team today were Arizona teammates Mike Bibby and Miles Simon and Kansas teammates Raef LaFrentz and Paul Pierce.

While Jamison was one vote shy of being a unanimous selection by the national media panel, the pairs of teammates became the sixth and seventh sets to be voted to the first team, and the first since UNLV's Larry Johnson and Stacey Augmon in 1991.

LaFrentz, the only returning All-America from last season, became the third repeat selection in the '90s, joining Tim Duncan of Wake Forest last year and Shaquille O'Neal of Louisiana State University in 1992.

Jamison, the Atlantic Coast Conference player of the year and a second-team All-America last year, was named to the first team on all but one of the 70 three-team ballots and had 348 points.

Bibby, the sophomore guard who was named Pac-10 player of the year, had 68 first-team votes and 346 points in the 5-3-1 point system.

The Kansas teammates were third and fourth in the voting. LaFrentz, the Big 12 player of the year the last two seasons, had 65 first-team votes and 340 points, 39 more than Pierce, the junior forward who received 51 first-team votes.

Simon, the Final Four MVP last season as a junior, had 18 first-team votes and 162 points.

The 6-foot-9-inch Jamison was the first Tar Heel to be named ACC player of the year since Michael Jordan in 1984. He averaged 22.9 points and 10.2 rebounds, the first Carolina player to average 20-10 since Billy Cunningham in 1964-65.

"Our guys have done a great job all year getting me the ball and playing as a team," said Jamison, who shot 61 percent from the field. "It's humbling to be named one of the best players in the country. Still, it's hard to focus on individual honors at this time of the year."

Bibby followed up a sensational freshman season by averaging 17.2 points, 5.9 assists and 2.4 steals as the Wildcats defended their national championship. He led the team with 67 three-pointers.

"It's a great accomplishment, but it won't mean as much if we don't win the national championship," Bibby said. "Since I'm a team player, my main goal right now is to help the team win it all again, and if that happens, it will make this honor even sweeter."

Simon joined Damon Stoudamire and Sean Elliott as the only players in Arizona history to score 1,500 points and have 400 assists. He averaged 17.3 points, second on the team to third-team All-America Michael Dickerson, and 4.5 assists.

"This is a great honor when you think about all the great players in the past who have been first-team All-Americans," Simon said. "To think of the company I am in is extremely gratifying."

LaFrentz missed nine games with a broken finger on his non-shooting hand, but still became the first Kansas player in 27 years to average double figures in points and rebounds with 19.7 and 11.2. He will finish second in both categories on Kansas' career list.

"I am honored to be listed in a group of players such as these, and I'm especially happy to be joined on the team by my teammate," said the 6-foot-11-inch senior, who shot 54 percent from the field. "I also appreciate the writers, who voted for me despite missing nine games with an injury."

Pierce, a 6-foot-7-inch swingman who averaged 20.3 points and 6.8 rebounds, took over the scoring load when LaFrentz was injured, shot 51 percent from the field and has a streak of 49 consecutive games scoring in double figures.

"Last year I was third-team all-conference, so to be named first-team All-America is a tremendous honor," Pierce said. "To be on the same team as players like Antawn and Raef is really a thrill."

Richard Hamilton of Connecticut, the Big East player of the year, led the second team and was joined by Ansu Sesay of Mississippi, Mateen Cleaves of Michigan State, Vince Carter of North Carolina and Pat Garrity of Notre Dame.

The third team was Lee Nailon of Texas Christian, Matt Harpring of Georgia Tech, Trajan Langdon of Duke, Dickerson and Bonzi Wells of Ball State.

The other first-team selections last season were seniors Duncan and Keith Van Horn of Utah and underclassmen Ron Mercer of Kentucky and Danny Fortson of Cincinnati, who left school early to play in the NBA.

Bruins slide out of slump in spite of struggles

SOFTBALL: Teamwork results in a 10th-inning victory over Notre Dame

By Kimberly Edds
Daily Bruin Contributor

Dreams can come true – just ask Lupe Brambila.

The walk-on freshman right-fielder scored the winning run in UCLA softball's 10th-inning 4-3 victory over Notre Dame (5-10) Tuesday.

"We came out with the win and that's the important thing," Brambila said.

The extra-inning win was in large part due to Karen Hoshizaki's single to center field, which was handled badly by Notre Dame center-fielder Jennifer Giampaolo, allowing Brambila to score.

UCLA (10-7) jumped to a 1-0 lead in the second inning when designated hitter Marin Noak scored, but Notre Dame rallied in the top of the fifth with three runs, taking the lead 3-1.

> UCLA struggled offensively. ... Defensively, however, the Bruins came out on top.

UCLA answered Notre Dame with one run in the bottom of the fifth.

It was not until the seventh inning that the Bruins tied the score at three with a sacrifice fly to center by third baseman Jenny Gardner to score shortstop Nicole Odom.

Winning pitcher Stephanie Swenson pitched a complete game for the Bruins. With this victory, Swenson improves to a record of 4-5.

"Stephanie's getting better and better. I have a lot of confidence in her ability to get us out of tough situations," head coach Sue Enquist said.

Senior forward J.R. Henderson has been a leader for the Bruins all year with his consistent play.

Henderson learning to sweeten play with a smile

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

J.R. Henderson did a little extra something to leave the Pauley Pavilion crowd speechless last Saturday.

No, his 15 points, five rebounds and two assists weren't anything special. For Henderson, those numbers were below his season averages.

Nor did any thunderous dunks, leaping rebounds and intimidating blocks make one think twice. Those, too, are all vintage Henderson.

Rather, what he did was so unlike Henderson that it left even the most casual fan thunderstruck.

He smiled.

Seriously, he really smiled ... and it was a mile wide.

As Henderson was introduced for the final time to the resounding cheers of the crowd, he just couldn't help himself.

And in that one all-too-brief but unforgettable moment, Henderson showed the fans and media alike what his teammates and coaches already knew – that in the senior forward's case, image isn't everything. In fact, it barely means anything at all.

"I've said all along that he is the most misunderstood player in college basketball," UCLA head coach Steve Lavin said. "He's really a very unselfish basketball player, very sensitive, very caring, and is really a good person. He doesn't always project that to the fans, the media or the scouts – what he is like as a person."

THE BEST JUST GOT BETTER

UCLA swimmer takes her enthusiasm straight into the record books

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Staff

Oh look, little Lindsay's all grown up.

When senior swimmer Lindsay Etter was a freshman, she used to get together with her freshman teammates and have late-night chats in the dorms. One night, they decided to give each other nicknames. Everyone saw Etter as Bubblelicious.

After three years, Bubblelicious still fits her well. She's cheerful, friendly and outgoing.

She's the girl next door.

Etter frequently speaks on the phone with her parents in Spring, Texas. She's a dedicated girlfriend, and she's just as dedicated to going to church and attending Bible study. And after she graduates, she would like to be a kindergarten teacher.

How can someone so wholesome be a lean, not-so-mean, record-breaking machine?

It just so happens that Lindsay Etter is the UCLA record holder in both the 100 and 200 breaststrokes. She first broke these school records her sophomore year at the 1996 NCAA Championships.

Last season, she went on to break both of her records at the NCAAs, decreasing her times to 1:00.77 and 2:11.59. Although Etter came in third in that record-breaking race, she says winning doesn't mean as much as good efforts and good performances.

"That was just a great race," Etter said. "I never thought I'd ever go that fast. There's hardly any race where you think, 'Is there anything I could've done better?' and you answer no. It was all happiness."

This season Etter continued to take charge of almost every breaststroke race, including the 100 breast in the Pac-10s, in which she tied the conference record.

Being a superb technician, Etter doesn't need the raw, muscular strength found in many of her competitors. She makes her swimming look so easy, while her competitors look strained and exhausted as they come into the wall behind her.

Someone as good as Etter can afford to be brash, but she remains modest and quickly turns the spotlight away. Staying true to her gracious personality, she adds that one of the most memorable moments in the NCAA Championships meet was watching her senior teammate Jill Jenkins making a comeback after back surgery.

"Watching Jill swim her lifetime best in her 50 freestyle after being out for so long – that was really huge for me. She's one of my best friends."

Besides Etter's lists of UCLA swimming accomplishments and records,

Student governments dispute utility fee

ASUCLA: Payment would cover expenses for common areas of Ackerman Union, Kerckhoff

By Michael Weiner
Daily Bruin Contributor

The students' association (ASUCLA) is proposing to charge more maintenance and utilities fees to the student governments, causing a rift between many students on the Board of Directors and the ASUCLA management.

Currently, the Undergraduate Students Association Council (USAC) and the Graduate Students Association (GSA) only pay maintenance and utilities fees for the space they use in Kerckhoff Hall. But, ASUCLA is planning to tack on an additional $50,000 to the student governments' fees every year.

The extra money will be used to pay maintenance and utilities fees for common areas in Ackerman Union and Kerckhoff Hall, such as hallways and restrooms.

Student board members are upset for various reasons. Some say that the fee should not be enacted the same year that ASUCLA is scheduled to make money. Other board members feel that $50,000 is too much for the student governments to afford, and that ASUCLA's relationship with the student governments is not based on money, but on service.

ASUCLA Chief Financial Officer Rich Delia said that charging the users of a building for common area maintenance is standard in a tenant-landlord relationship. But, graduate student board member Jim Friedman does not see ASUCLA's relationship with the inhabitants of Kerckhoff in that way.

"(The management staff's) response has been that it's a standard of industry, but we're not a standard industry," Friedman said.

According to Delia, the student union used to pay all of the fees for common areas, but when the student union fee was raised from $7.50 per year to $51 per year, it was determined that the student governments should share in the cost of maintaining ASUCLA's facilities.

The $50,000 fee was waived for the fiscal year 1997-98 because the student governments had already worked out their budgets for the year when the fee was to be implemented. Next year, it is planned that GSA and USAC will pay half of the fee, and in subsequent years they will pay the entire $50,000.

Hugo Maldonado, an undergraduate board representative, emphasized that the student government aspect of ASUCLA is different from the association's other divisions, because its purpose is not to make money.

"The student governments are service-orient-

Harman honored for fostering intercultural sensitivity

AWARD: Businessman overshadowed by wife's bid for governor's seat

By George Sweeney
Daily Bruin Contributor

On an evening filled with high-powered politicians, businessmen, and diplomats, the person who took the spotlight at the 1998 Neil H. Jacoby Award Dinner was, appropriately, the honoree. However, it became startlingly apparent that his wife would soon overtake the spotlight.

Hundreds of people packed the dining room of the Beverly Wilshire Hotel on Tuesday to honor Sydney Harman, the CEO of Harman International, with the Jacoby Award for excellence in promoting international and intercultural understanding.

Given by the Dashew International Center, the organization that runs UCLA's international students' program and is funding the new Bradley International Building, The Jacoby Award has been given to such distinguished persons as Gene Stone, Kirk and Anne Douglas, and former Chancellor Charles E. Young.

And while the event was not a political gathering, the evening was almost undercut by his wife Jane Harman's bid for the governor's seat.

If all works out in November, Sydney Harman, on top of running a Fortune 500 company, will "become the greatest first husband that California has ever had," said Jack Valenti, honorary chairman of the dinner.

However, Harman the candidate downplayed her own involvement in the event, and instead chose to focus on her husband's own myriad accomplishments.

"I stand beside him because I believe in building one California where all people can come together to share in California's newfound prosperity ... building one world for one California," Harman said, focusing on California's progression towards becoming an international center.

However, Sydney Harman could not help but bring his wife's gubernatorial aspirations into play during his speech, tying together the evening's theme and his hope for new leadership in the state capitol.

"I am convinced that the next governor of the state," he said, "whoever she may be, will understand (the need for a global community) very well."

Not to allow the spotlight to be taken from the honoree, Stanley Dashew, the founder of the Dashew Center, praised Sydney Harman, the immigrant who became a multi-millionaire industrialist.

"(Harman) has contributed to world understanding through his politics and his business," Dashew said.

"He's been an outstanding industrialist, he has great 'people policies' inside of his corporation and he has been a pioneer in the field of audio electronics. He comprises what America makes possible and Sydney Harman, as an immigrant, typifies what America makes possible."

And while his pursuit and attainment of the American dream was an important part of his gaining the

Gene mutation may be linked to compulsive, risky behavior

HEALTH: Presence of DRD2 form heightens drive to find pleasure

By Kathryn Combs
Daily Bruin Staff

In the face of social pressures against smoking and recent anti-smoking laws, those who claim they don't have the willpower to quit smoking may have yet another excuse: it could be genetic.

According to Dr. Ernest Noble, director of the UCLA Alcohol Research Center, an individual's affinity for smoking may have a genetic cause.

In the United States each year, more than 400,000 people die of smoking-related causes and approximately 160,000 die of causes related to lung cancer.

In an article published in the Journal of the National Cancer Institute earlier this month, Noble claims a genetic mutation could be responsible for compulsive behaviors such as smoking, drinking and drug use.

In 1990, Noble and colleagues discovered a genetic mutation on the DRD2 gene. The D2 dopamine receptor (DRD2) gene is responsible for the production of dopamine in the brain.

When an individual experiences pleasure, dopamine is the molecule that is responsible for stimulating this response in the brain, Noble explained.

Noble and his colleagues found that the A1 and B1 alleles in the DRD2 gene are responsible for compulsive behavior.

In 1990, the DRD2 gene was found to be associated with the prevalence of severe alcoholism. Since then, it has been hypothesized that the gene is linked to cocaine abuse, cigarette smoking and other polysubstance abuse.

Carnesale's office hours give students voice

On Wednesday, Chancellor Albert Carnesale held office hours for students.

All students were notified by e-mail of the time and given the opportunity to enter their names into a lottery for the six slots, which were 10 minutes each.

The reasons for seeing the chancellor ranged from raising concerns and telling him about programs to offering compliments.

Michael Skolnik, a second-year theater student, wanted to tell Carnesale about a new program he and other theater students are organizing to bring the theater to children. As they have planned it, the program starts in spring with one school and plans to expand to seven.

Andrew Sipolla had a different reason. "I decided to talk about what we as students can do to make UCLA and upper echelon school," he said.

Vanessa Marshall came to raise the chancellor's awareness to an issue. The way the new musical theater program is being created has angered her and her fellow students.

"Others have tried (to talk to the chancellor), but they were unable to get a spot," she said. "So, I am speaking for all of us."

African Center looking for students to travel

UCLA's James S. Coleman African Studies Center has established a six-week summer program with the East African Ugonzi Institute, and is looking for participants for this summer.

The program will take place in Tanzania where 38 undergraduates with demonstrated leadership potential from a variety of areas will exchange ideas with African leaders and Africanist scholars.

The goal is to teach the students problem-solving skills, critical thinking, and the values of teamwork.

Edmond Keller, a political science professor and director of the Coleman Center, said he thinks the program would be a formative experience for participants.

"While American undergraduates might be well-trained in theory methods, and be familiar with African issues through their classroom learning, few have had the experience of living in Africa and interacting with African cohorts in their own environment," said Keller.

The institute is looking for students in good standing at the middle of their undergraduate careers.

Applications are now available at the Coleman Center in Bunche Hall.

Voice acting class now offered at UCLA

The UCLA Extension program will offer a course on voice-over acting in the spring called "Character Voice Acting for Animation and Commercials."

Joni Robbins, a voice actor and director on animation projects, will teach the course both the technical and business aspects of voice-over acting.

"People who sing in choirs, those who are 'living room comics' and people who like to do funny voices for family and friends can have a real talent that needs to be developed for a career in voice-over acting," Robbins said.

The course meets on six Thursdays, April 16 through May 21 at 7 to 10 p.m. at 325 Botany at UCLA. It costs $355.

Interested people who wish to obtain more information or enroll can calling the UCLA Extension's Department of Entertainment Studies and Performing Arts at (310) 825-9064 or visit the UCLA Extension web site on the internet at http://www.unex.ucla.edu.

Guiding light

David Francisco, campus tour guide coordinator, gives high schoolers a taste of UCLA

By Rachel Muñoz
Daily Bruin Staff

Out of Young Hall emerges a large group of high school students with wide eyes and curious stares. Slowly, amongst their friends, they gather around the assigned college students who will give them their tour.

"How are you guys doing today?" one of the college students asks with enthusiasm, pulling the group away from the building and into an open area of south campus.

"Who here is interested in the sciences?" Only a few in the front hear him, and most don't even answer. And so it begins for one of the morning's campus tour guides, David Francisco.

He is the one in the front asking the questions, trying to excite the 22 10th graders and teacher in front of him. As a campus tour coordinator and fifth-year psychology student, also pursuing a minor in accounting, this is how he spends many mornings at UCLA.

But he isn't discouraged. It is still early.

As the tour leaves south campus, the first stop is the inverted fountain, where the high school students learn the eight clap. Some know the clap from growing up in the UCLA tradition. Others only give it a half-hearted attempt, anxious to see the rest of the campus, or just uninterested.

After a quick explanation of the names and services of each building, Francisco keeps up the pace, leading the students to the steps of Schoenberg Hall.

Here he sits them down and gets to the nitty-gritty of what many students would like to know before applying to UCLA.

Before he can get started, one international student is curious about what majors UCLA has to offer. Her question is soon answered as Francisco rattles off the five different schools at UCLA with ease and describes the majors in each school.

He admits that the statistics are grim. Thirty thousand students apply to UCLA every year and only 10,000 are accepted. But he continues to encourage them with pointers on extra-curricular activities, AP classes, and how to write a good essay.

"Don't use big words in your essays," he advises. "Just be yourself."

His girlfriend, Kim LaMagna, a fourth-year English student with a minor in education, believes that Francisco has a good source for his information on the application process.

"He gives good insight because his boss reviews the applications," she said. "So he knows exactly what they are looking for."

Now that the students have woken up a bit more, they drill Francisco on all the aspects of getting into UCLA and preparing the essay. When questions are sufficiently answered, the tour continues.

Although Francisco walks backward throughout almost the entire one-and-a-half hour tour, the pace is surprisingly quick. He makes sure to keep the students interested, asking questions and mentioning interesting aspects of the campus.

He points out Murphy Hall, the Law School, and then calls attention to Perloff Plaza on the other side of the street asking, "Do you recognize this plaza? This is where they filmed Higher Learning."

Passing LuValle, the students are impressed with the different kinds of food available – especially Taco Bell. One guy exclaims he would eat there all the time.

They are even more impressed when they hear that they don't have to go to the same classes everyday, and that they can basically make their own schedule.

Traveling through the Franklin Murphy Sculpture Garden, Francisco mentions that Thursday night is a big party night at UCLA and many students here adjust their schedules accordingly.

This news spreads like wildfire through the students, as their imaginations wander to the days when they won't have to report to mom and dad.

Francisco gives them a minute to stop and look around while he answers their questions. Then he dives into the the application process for the School of Theater, Film and Television. Their eyes widen when they hear the numbers of pages they must write for the application.

One overanxious student insists that he can handle the required 10-page screenplay, poem, or essay because tonight he has to write a five-page essay.

In the back of the crowd, three trendy girls discuss their fears regarding how much they are going to have to write when they get to college. But, a new fear soon takes over the discussion: what major they will choose.

Soon the students are moving past the URL, Northern Lights and find themselves in front of Royce. "What do you notice about this building? Is there anything different about it," he asks.

After a few correct and incorrect guesses, Francisco finally informs them of the difference: the width of the two top columns is uneven.

The building was actually designed after a church in Milan. "It's modeled with the concept that only God can create perfection," he said.

Deadly asteroid could collide with earth

ASTRONOMY: Rock may pass by; impact would create mass destruction

By Paul Recer
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – A mile-wide asteroid described as "the most dangerous one we've found so far" may be on course for a 2028 collision with Earth and certainly will pass closer than any such object in modern times, astronomers said Wednesday.

"The chance of an actual collision is small, but one is not entirely out of the question," according to a notice filed by the International Astronomical Union. But asteroid specialist Jack G. Hills said the speeding space rock, called asteroid 1997 XF11, poses a real danger to Earth.

"This is the first really big one to pass this close," said Hills, a Los Alamos National Laboratory scientist. "This is the most dangerous one we've found so far."

He added: "It scares me. It really does. An object this big hitting the Earth has the potential of killing many, many people."

"It has enormous destructive potential," agreed Steven Maran of the American Astronomical Society, but he added it will take several more years of observations before experts are certain of its path.

Asteroid 1997 XF11 was discovered Dec. 6 by the University of Arizona Spacewatch program and was added to a list of 108 asteroids considered to be "potentially hazardous objects."

Maran noted that no asteroid the size of 1997 XF11 has ever been predicted to pass so close to the Earth.

Asteroids are routinely observed and plotted by astronomers around the world because of their potential for great destruction on Earth.

An asteroid six to 10 miles across collided with the Earth about 65 million years ago and is thought to have caused the extinction of the dinosaurs, along with 75 percent of all other species.

Hills said an asteroid the size of 1997 XF11 colliding with the Earth at more than 17,000 miles an hour would explode with an energy of about 320,000 megatons of dynamite. That equals almost 2 million Hiroshima-sized atomic bombs.

> "This is the most dangerous (asteroid) we've found so far."
> Jack G. Hills
> Scientist

Such an asteroid hitting the ocean, said Hills, would create a tidal wave hundreds of feet high, causing extreme flooding for thousands of miles of coast line.

"If one like this hit in the Atlantic Ocean, all of the coastal cities would be scoured by the tsunami," said Hills. "Where cities stood, there would be only mudflats."

If such an asteroid hit on land, he said, it would instantly dig a crater 20 miles across and so clog the sky with dust and vapor that the sun would be darkened "for weeks, if not months."

Maran said the best estimate is that the mile-wide 1997 XF11 will pass inside the orbit of the moon, with the most likely separation from the center of the Earth of about 30,000 miles. The Earth has a radius of about 4,000 miles.

The estimate, said Maran, has a margin of error of more than 180,000 miles. This means a collision with Earth is theoretically possible, but uncertain at this time, he said.

Better estimates of the collision potential will be generated as astronomers plot the course of the asteroid through the heavens over the next few years.

Observations made earlier this month by University of Texas astronomers indicated the asteroid would make its nearest approach to the Earth on Oct. 26, 2028, at about 1:30 p.m. EDT.

"There is still some uncertainty to the computation," said the bulletin from the International Astronomical Union.

The notice said the asteroid, which is on a wide-swinging, independent orbit of the sun, will move out of view to all but the largest telescopes over the next few months. It will become more visible once again in 2000. And in 2002, it is expected to pass within about six million miles of Earth on the day before Halloween.

Hills said the asteroid is lost from view when it passes behind the sun, but that it will emerge into telescope range about every two years.

Astronomers eventually will be able to track the object using radar, he said, and this will enable them to establish a precise orbital path years ahead of the possible impact. Only then, said Hills, will the true risk of collision be known.

Experts long concerned about the potential danger of asteroids have said the Earth could be protected by exploding a missile near the speeding rock while it was far away. The intent would be to nudge the asteroid onto a path that would send it safely away from the planet.

"If it is going to hit the Earth, there's no question that we should try to deflect it," said Hills. "It would be money well spent."

Asian American groups sue for racial harassment

HOUSING: Authorities allegedly fail to respond to complaints in projects

By Bob Egelko
The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO – Asian American groups complaining of racial harassment and violence in public housing projects filed a civil rights suit Wednesday accusing the San Francisco Housing Authority of failing to protect Asian tenants and ignoring complaints.

"People are being harassed, beaten, shot at, and the manager says there's nothing they can do," attorney Gen Fujioka of the Asian Law Caucus told reporters.

He said the problems have existed for at least 15 years, but the Housing Authority, which oversees federally subsidized housing for 30,000 low-income residents, "has failed to take any meaningful steps to address these incidents."

In a separate action, the Vietnamese American Coalition for Civil Rights asked the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development to order the San Francisco agency to admit the existence of racial harassment and change its policy on placing minority tenants in dangerous areas. The coalition said the Housing Authority has continued to deny the problem and has accused Asians of seeking advantages over black tenants.

Housing Authority spokesman Ron Sonenshine called the complaints "ludicrous." He said the authority had complied with every request made by the same civil rights advocates at a meeting several months ago, including hiring a Vietnamese speaker, being more sensitive to incoming Asian American families, and preparing a report on hate crimes.

"We've made lots of progress," he said. "I don't think we're remiss in dealing with these issues, and I don't think we're insensitive ... You're dealing with people who believe they're targets. In some cases that's true and in some cases it's not."

In one incident, Tem Le, a 35-year-old mother of four, was beaten unconscious last May by five teen-agers using rocks and bottles. Sonenshine said police determined that the attackers were not public housing residents, and the Housing Authority has responded, making outside access more difficult.

HUD took over supervision of San Francisco public housing in March 1996 after finding that incompetent management was forcing tenants to live in homes that were not "decent, safe or sanitary." HUD returned control to the local agency last September but ordered a plan within 60 days to address racial harassment and violence. The report has not been issued, said lawyers for the Asian groups.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court, said the Housing Authority assigned Asian-Americans "to known areas of high risk" without warning of the dangers, and penalized those who objected to the placements.

The suit said one plaintiff, Cambodian immigrant Bunly Noun, and his wife and three children were the targets of name-calling, beatings and rock-throwing after moving into the Potrero Terrace project. Their complaints were discouraged and they waited over five years for a transfer, only to be offered a unit at the equally dangerous Hunter's View development, the suit said.

The suit seeks a court order requiring the authority to "immediately adopt appropriate policies and programs" to stop racial harassment. It seeks no damages.

Iran must pay for terrorist attack

RULING: Court orders family of American woman killed by suicide bomber be paid $250 million in damages under new law

By Slobodan Lekic
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – A federal judge ordered Iran to pay $247.5 million in damages to the family of an American woman killed in a suicide bombing in Gaza in 1995. "The court is seeking to deter further terrorist actions" said District Court Judge Royce Lamberth.

The ruling Wednesday was the first under a new law allowing Americans to sue nations believed to sponsor terrorism for damages caused by such attacks. While the victim's family is unlikely to collect the damage award any time soon, the ruling could complicate tentative efforts to improve relations between the United States and Iran.

"Terrorists and the countries which sponsor them should know that we will continue to increase the price to be paid for acts of terrorism," declared Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J., who heads the House Task Force on Terrorism. "This decision clearly shows that we will ... hit them hard in the wallet as well."

Iran vehemently denies it has any connections to terrorist groups or attacks. Although Lamberth said Iranian representatives had been invited to testify at court hearings on Mar. 3-4, a spokesman for the Iranian mission to the United Nations said Wednesday he was not aware of the court case in Washington.

The two countries have been bitter foes since the 1979 ouster of Shah Reza Mohammed Pahlavi and the taking of U.S. hostages. But since the election last year of a moderate cleric as president of Iran, there have been signs of a possible thaw and re-establishment of cultural and other ties. President Clinton greeted Mohammad Khatami's election as a "hopeful sign" but demanded that Tehran renounce terrorism and endorse the Israeli-Arab peace process.

The ruling, made under the Antiterrorism Act of 1996, would award the money to the family of Alisa Flatow, 20, of West Orange, N.J., who was student at a seminary in Jerusalem when she was killed in an attack on a bus in the Gaza Strip on Apr. 9, 1995. Seven Israeli soldiers also died in the attack for which Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility.

The judge agreed with the Flatow family that Islamic Jihad is backed by Iran's Islamic government and that Iran therefore is responsible for her death.

"The lunatics who planted the bomb and drove the van that killed Alisa were not acting alone," said Stephen Flatow, the student's father. "A state sponsor of terrorism such as the Islamic Republic of Iran has to be held to

Clinton signs waiver in push for granting favored nation trade status to Vietnam

DIPLOMACY: Montagnards insist action ignores plight of victims, increases power of government

By Donna Abu-Nasr
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – President Clinton took a step Wednesday toward giving Vietnam full trade benefits, a move opposed by representatives of Vietnam's Montagnards who say the communist country still suppresses its citizens and denies them the right to emigrate freely.

Clinton signed a waiver to exempt Vietnam from legislation that restricts trade with communist countries. His action asks Congress to exempt Vietnam from the Jackson-Vanik amendment, which prevents normalized economic relations with a communist country unless it permits free emigration.

Representatives of the Montagnards said earlier that the Clinton administration should not give Vietnam full trade benefits until the communist country grants its citizens full rights. "There is no reason for the U.S. government to give away our last leverage in such a hurry and to ignore the plight of the victims of persecution in Vietnam," said Nguyen Dinh Thang, executive director of Boat People S.O.S.

The waiver is another step toward normalizing ties between Vietnam and the United States. "There's real reason to believe, not just pie-in-the-sky hope ... that moving forward with the ... waiver and some of the additional programs will increase our chances of making progress with the Vietnamese" on several issues, including the Montagnards issue, said Stanley Roth, assistant

NATIONAL MONUMENT: Road through parks would destroy sacred Indian rock drawings, activists say

By Doug Johnson
The Associated Press

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. – Urban sprawl scored a small victory over the protection of national parks Wednesday, conservationists say.

A U.S. Senate committee approved a proposal that would allow Albuquerque officials to extend a major road through Petroglyph National Monument, home to ancient Indian rock drawings considered sacred by many pueblo tribes.

Conservationists called the approval a dark day for the national park system.

"Congress took another step toward approving the paving of America's national parks," said Dave Simon, southwest regional director of the National Parks and Conservation Association here. "If the government can do it here, monuments in other states will be next."

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., introduced the proposal to change the 1990 law establishing the national monument on Albuquerque's West Mesa. It would allow the city to extend Paseo del Norte, a six-lane

Wilson formally ends contract preference law

SACRAMENTO – Gov. Pete Wilson has formally terminated enforcement of a state law giving preferences in state contracting to firms owned by minorities and women.

The Republican governor, who has led the campaign to end affirmative action programs such as the gender and racial set-asides in state contracts, said Wednesday that he could not end those preference programs after passage of Proposition 209 until an appellate court ruled them unconstitutional.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals made its final ruling overturning contract preferences on Monday – although the case it acted on didn't directly involved Proposition 209 – and Wilson signed an executive order late Tuesday terminating those programs.

"From now on, the state will award contracts solely on the individual merits of the bid," he said, adding that his executive order also directs all state agencies to develop outreach programs to encourage minority- and women-owned firms to compete for state contracts.

Philippines, rebels reach major accord

MANILA, Philippines – The Philippines government has reached its first major agreement with Communist rebels aimed at ending their 28-year insurgency, President Fidel Ramos said Wednesday.

The agreement with the rebel National Democratic Front covers a wide spectrum of human rights issues, Ramos said.

It is to be signed Sunday in the Netherlands, where rebel leaders live in exile and where peace talks have been held since 1992.

Ramos urged negotiators to "redouble their efforts to end this prolonged fratricidal conflict" and "bring about a lasting peace."

The agreement is the first of four accords the two sides hope to reach for a political settlement. Negotiations now move on to social and economic reforms.

The accord on human rights was sealed when the two sides came to terms on compensating victims of abuses under the late dictator Ferdinand Marcos, Ramos said.

He was referring to a judgment obtained in a Honolulu court by 9,539 Filipinos who were awarded $2 billion from the Marcos estate. Many of the plaintiffs were mistreated for belonging to the front or 14 Marxist groups under the front's umbrella.

Gore prods Congress on patient bill of rights

WASHINGTON – Taking a poke at Congress for its "mighty light workload," Vice President Al Gore Wednesday called the health care industry's treatment of women intolerable and said lawmakers must approve consumer protections before adjourning for the year.

Gore, on the occasion of International Women's Day, met at the White House with 18 representatives of women's activist groups, including the Older Women's League and American Nurses Association. He said President Clinton's health care quality commission recently documented "very strong evidence of the unequal treatment of women in our health care system." Women are less likely to be referred to specialists and three times as likely as men to be told that their medical condition is "all in their heads," Gore said.

The administration has asked Congress to guarantee under federal law certain patient rights – including, Gore said, the right for pregnant women to see the same OB-GYN specialist throughout their pregnancies.

House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., predicted this week that Congress would pass this year some sort of bill regulating managed care plans and giving patients the right to take health insurance grievances to court.

Deportation of six Iraqi refugees ordered by U.S.

IMMIGRATION: Men say they helped in failed CIA plot to overthrow Hussein

By Michael Fleeman
The Associated Press

Six Iraqis who say they helped the CIA in failed plots to topple Saddam Hussein were ordered deported from the United States and may be sent home where they believe they face execution.

U.S. Immigration Judge D.D. Sitgraves denied political asylum applications for the men, who were among thousands of refugees evacuated to this country from northern Iraq when Hussein crushed opposition forces in 1996.

"There are reasonable grounds for regarding the applicants as a danger to the national security of the United States," the judge wrote in her ruling Monday.

In the portion of the ruling made public, the judge didn't give her reasons for agreeing with the Immigration and Naturalization Service's claims the men were a threat to the United States. The men have said that U.S. officials consider them spies for Hussein.

Indeed, much of the ruling was sealed, even from the defense attorneys and the Iraqis, for what the judge said were security reasons. Also, many of the witnesses who testified against the men during hearings last year did so in private before the judge, outside the presence of the defense.

Immigration courts do not follow the same rules as other courts. Defendants, for instance, are not automatically given the presumption of innocence nor do they enjoy the right to hear evidence against them.

Defense attorneys were reviewing the ruling to decide whether to appeal or seek other options, including deportation to a country other than Iraq. In the meantime, the men will remain jailed.

"I don't believe the federal government will deport our clients to Iraq because it would be a public relations nightmare because our clients are dead if they are deported," said defense attorney Niels Frenzen of the public interest law firm Public Counsel.

The defense was given 55 pages of the 147-page decision, Frenzen said.

"We know that our clients have been found to be security risks, but we don't know the reasons why our clients have been found security risks," Frenzen said. "We were hoping the decision would shed a little light on the nature of the charges,

Weapon blacklist remains in effect

BAN: Appeal alleging unconstitutionality goes to State Supreme Court

The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO – California's assault weapons law, which bans 62 semiautomatic rifles, pistols and shotguns, remains in effect despite a state appeals court ruling that cast doubt on its constitutionality, Attorney General Dan Lungren said Wednesday.

In a notice to law enforcement agencies statewide, Lungren noted that last week's ruling struck down only one portion of the law, which allowed expansion of the banned list to cover guns virtually identical to those on the list.

The court also said the entire law may be unconstitutional because the banned guns were allegedly no more dangerous than other semiautomatic weapons that remain legal. The court did not forbid enforcement of the gun ban, however, and instead told a Sacramento Superior Court judge to decide the issue after a trial to determine the facts.

As a result, Lungren said Wednesday, the current ban will stay in effect even after last week's ruling becomes final in 30 days. Lungren also plans to appeal the ruling to the state Supreme Court.

The law, passed in 1989 after a Stockton schoolyard shooting, specified the prohibited guns by make and model and also said guns that contained only slight modifications, or minor differences, could be banned.

Those so-called copycat weapons can be added to the list by the state attorney general, subject to a Superior Court judge's approval. That was the provision overturned last week by the 3rd District Court of Appeal, which said the constitutional separation of powers was violated when a judge took over the legislative function of deciding whether a gun was illegal.

> The ruling ... has no immediate effect because Lungren has never added any weapons to the list.

The ruling, even if upheld on appeal, has no immediate effect because Lungren has never added any weapons to the list. He proposed some additions – criticized as woefully inadequate by gun-control advocates – but has been blocked for years by the appeals court while it considered the constitutional issue.

In a separate case, the state Supreme Court has agreed to decide whether local prosecutors can go after owners of guns virtually identical to those on the list of 62 banned weapons, without action from the attorney general.

One legislative gun-control supporter, Assemblyman Don Perata, D-Oakland, says Lungren should drop his defense of the 1989 law and support Perata's AB23, which has passed the Assembly and now awaits a state Senate vote. Rather than banning specified weapons, the bill would define illegal assault weapons according to their firepower and military characteristics.

Perata says his measure would provide stronger protection without the legal problems of the current law. Lungren has opposed the measure in the past, but now is taking no position in order to avoid confusing the issue during his defense of the current law, Lungren spokesman Rob Stutzman said Tuesday.

Stutzman said one reason for Lungren's past opposition was that Perata's bill would outlaw at least five times as many guns but did not contain the $830,000 that Lungren's office would need for increased registrations.

Republicans engage in budget battle

SURPLUS: Some favor domestic program cuts for emergency spending

By Alan Fram
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — First it was tax cuts. Now it's spending that has convulsed congressional Republicans in an internal fight over how to handle expected budget surpluses and their party's message this election year.

Eager to avoid reminding voters of their unsuccessful veto fight with President Clinton last spring over an amendment they tried to attach to flood aid to the Midwest, many GOP leaders want to quickly approve emergency spending that he has requested for defense and recent U.S. natural disasters.

Clinton wants to use the expected $8 billion budget surplus to pay for his $2.5 billion emergency package. It includes money for U.S. troops in Bosnia and the Persian Gulf and for rebuilding after storms in Florida, California, New England and Guam.

While nearly all lawmakers support the requested expenditures, many rank-and-file Republicans, especially conservatives, want to pay for them with cuts in domestic programs. Reining in federal spending is precisely what Republicans stand for, they argue, and will motivate conservatives to vote in the congressional elections in November, when the absence of a presidential race should keep turnout low.

"We came here to be different" from pro-spending Democrats, said Rep. Steve Largent, R-Okla., a conservative leader. "If we don't, it's a bad sign that we're reverting to business as usual in an election year."

But leaders including House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., and House Appropriations Committee Chairman Bob Livingston, R-La., have urged colleagues to go along with Clinton's request to use the surplus for the emergency spending. Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., said last week that he also favors following that route.

They worry that if the measure is financed with domestic spending cuts, it could be defeated in the House or Senate — where Democrats solidly oppose domestic cuts — or vetoed by Clinton. And that could invite renewed accusations by Clinton and Democrats that Republicans are delaying needed funds for U.S. troops and disaster-battered Americans just so the GOP can slash needed domestic programs.

"It's the art of the doable," said Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., a member of Gingrich's leadership team. "It's what can we get done that we can get the administration to sign onto."

The battle also has overtones from the jockeying already under way to succeed Gingrich as speaker should he resign to run for president next year. The two main rivals for Gingrich's job seem to have taken different sides: Livingston has been reluctant to cut domestic programs to pay for the emergency bill, while House Majority Leader Dick Armey, R-Texas, has said he prefers to do so.

With the Senate expected to begin debating the bill next week and the House the week after, Gingrich's side is considered likely to prevail. But in a signal of how widespread support might be for finding offsetting spending cuts, 14 House GOP moderates signed one letter to Gingrich backing them, and 23 mostly conservative House Republicans, including the

Lowered legal alcohol limits lessen crash risk

DRIVING: States with tougher laws have fewer fatal accidents

By Michelle Boorstein
The Associated Press

It sounds like a no-brainer: Lower the legal blood-alcohol limit, keep more drunken drivers off American highways, save lives.

That's the theory in the 15 states that lowered their thresholds from 0.10 percent to 0.08 percent; in Washington state, where the governor is expected to sign the Legislature's newly passed 0.08 limit; and in 14 other states where lawmakers are pushing for the lower limit.

And last week, the Senate voted overwhelmingly to withhold federal highway money from states that don't follow suit. The House will take up the matter when the Senate finishes work on the $173-billion highway bill.

Does the lower limit actually lessen highway carnage?

In some of the states with 0.08 laws, the raw number of deaths in drunken driving accidents, unadjusted for population change, fell with the new standard. In some, the number rose. In others, it's gone up and down since the law changed.

As obvious as the benefits of the lower alcohol limit might seem, it's a tricky business to measure the effect on traffic fatalities.

For starters, reducing the amount of alcohol a driver may legally drink is just one preventive measure in operation. More cars are now equipped with airbags, more drivers buckle their seat belts, more roads are designed more safely and more states are stripping bad drivers of their licenses.

Additionally, many states

SMOKING

"We found that this gene variant was found in people who were active smokers, and found less of a prevalence in people who had quit smoking," Noble said.

"There was also a very low prevalence in those who are non-smokers or who had never smoked," he added.

Dr. David Comings, with the City of Hope Hospital, has conducted similar research and says that not only are Noble's findings plausible, they are probable.

"We found that this gene was present in 48 percent of a group of 331 individuals, as opposed to 25 percent in our control group," Comings said.

According to Noble, smokers whose genetic makeup contain a minor form of the DRD2 gene are more likely not only to begin smoking earlier in their lives, but are also likely to have more difficult time trying to kick the habit.

"If you have the gene form, your brain makes fewer dopamine receptors," Noble said. "These are the pleasure areas of the brain. We hypothesized that these individuals don't feel the normal pleasures in life."

As a result, individuals with this genetic predisposition seek out activities which heighten the stimulation of dopamine-producing areas in the brain, such as smoking and eating.

"(However), not everyone who is a smoker has this gene form, and we call those environmental types," Noble said.

"We found when you measure behavior, such as personality, those individuals that have the minor form of this gene are risk-takers," Noble said, explaining that although an individual may be genetically susceptible to life-threatening behaviors such as substance abuse, these individuals do not always exhibit negative types of behavior.

In fact, Noble said that in a long-term study of children and adults who possess the minor form of the DRD2 allele and who do not exhibit addictive behaviors related to substance abuse, many take risks in other ways such as bungee jumping and parachuting. They are novelty seekers, according to Noble.

"It's like there are two sides of the coin," he said.

"There is a dark side which gets you to use alcohol and gets you into accidents and drugs ... and there is the other side which makes you look for new things," Noble said. "Perhaps some of our greatest explorers like Magellan or Cooke could have had this."

According to Dr. Donald Tashkin, a professor with the UCLA School of Medicine, this investigation may be helpful in designing more effective treatment for problems with substance abuse.

"If we could identify a genetic basis for the use of addictive drugs, we might be able to develop more effective pharmacological approaches as well as treatment of addiction," he added.

Dr. Comings agreed. Researchers are already exploring the possibilities. "Agents which act on these dopamine receptors can probably help," Comings said.

The development of drugs to treat this lack of dopamine is currently being conducted.

"We need a targeted approach," Noble said. "If you have the genetic form, while the environmental approach may be helpful, I think you may eventually have to develop drugs to help."

"You may be able to target such individuals ... (to) prevent them from initializing use, or in assisting them in the cessation of use," he added.

REAL BRUINS

While Francisco focuses on Royce, three guys in the back with matching beanies and wrap around sunglasses voice their concern over when they will receive their next meal.

Before descending on the Janss steps, the students learn that there are over 100 languages taught at UCLA and that the school has more parking than the airport. Francisco also mentions that parts of "The Nutty Professor" were filmed on these steps.

The group moves into Meyerhoff Plaza, the area of Bruin Walk near Kerckhoff Hall. Students are impressed to learn that parts of "Scream II" were filmed in this area.

As the tour continues in the direction of Pauley Pavilion, he points out the James West Alumni Center and notes that there are over 300,000 UCLA alumni.

It takes a few minutes but once the students get inside of Pauley, most of them have found their way down the steps and onto the basketball court with another tour in process.

One student and the teacher decide to take a break and find themselves a seat.

After a few minutes of looking around, the tour winds down and the students are led to the Bruin Bear.

Francisco determines how to end the tour by what the group seems most interested in. For this group, he reiterated what they needed to know to get into UCLA.

A round of applause is the signal that the tour has ended and Francisco heads up Bruin Walk to grab a bite to eat at his usual eatery, Taco Bell.

His favorite spot to eat with friends, affectionately known as the Perch, is being occupied by another group for the day. A rally against bombing Iraq is taking place so Francisco and friends have to settle for another area of Bruin Walk.

The hour break comes to a close too soon and Francisco finds himself heading back up to the same office in Murphy Hall that he has been going to since April of 1996, when he was hired as a campus tour guide. The rest of his day, until about 5 p.m., will be spent in the office.

Though he has been with campus tours for almost two years, Francisco has spent much of his time at UCLA doing other things.

He worked with Project Share, a tutor and mentor program, for 10 quarters, seven of which he spent as director. He worked to stabilize the program and looks back on it as a good experience.

Francisco pledged Pi Kappa Alpha, the Pike fraternity, in the fall of 1993 and worked as one of the two vice presidents for two years.

"It's ironic. If you join a fraternity people think that all you do is party, but through the fraternity I joined the project," he said.

When he isn't tutoring kids or showing them around the campus, Francisco likes to kick around a soccer ball and has always participated in

THE POL POT REGIME
Genocide in Cambodia Under the Khmer Rouge 1975-79

Sunday, March 15 7:30 pm

The Khmer Rouge revolution turned Cambodia into grisly killing fields, as the Pol Pot regime murdered or starved to death a million and a half of Cambodia's eight million inhabitants.

This comprehensive study of the Pol Pot regime describes the violent origins, social context, and course of the revolution, and provides a new answer to the question of why a group of Cambodian intellectuals imposed genocide on their own country.

Ben Kiernan is Associate Professor of History and director of the Cambodian Genocide Program at Yale University.

TO THE OTHER SHORE
The Russian Intellectuals Who Came To America

Monday, March 23 7:30 pm

To The Other Shore tells the story of a small but influential group of Jewish intellectuals who immigrated to the United States from the Russian Empire between 1881 and the early 1920s—the era of "mass immigration". This group of Jewish intellectuals, many of whom were raised in Orthodox homes, abandoned their Jewish identity, absorbed the radical political theories circulating in nineteenth-century Russia, and brought those theories with them to America.

Steven Cassedy is Professor of Slavic and Comparative Literature at the UC San Diego.

This led to an obvious attraction to the new Los Angeles soccer team, the Galaxy. Over a two-year period, he kept statistics for the soccer team as an official scorekeeper.

But now he spends most of his time in the campus tour office, where he knows he should be. His position as coordinator restricts him to the duties of the office, but because of transitions in hiring, Francisco happily finds himself out on campus showing the sights and sounds of UCLA. He considers his job the best on campus.

"People want these jobs because they are fun and you get to interact with people," he said.

As one of three coordinators, for 19 hours a week, he is responsible for running campus tours.

"Our tours are for students interested in attending UCLA," Francisco said, "and we deal primarily with high school groups." However, last summer, he was able to give a tour to the new chancellor, Albert Carnesale.

Apparently, he is doing a good job. In the midst of the hustle and bustle of the busy office, his boss walks over and places an evaluation on his desk.

"Thank you so much for the extra attention given to our students," wrote Linda Muscarella of Arroyo Grande High School.

As a boss, Francisco also seems to be scoring a few points. "Dave is a very fair and fun boss to work for," said Grant Gelberg, a campus tour guide, fraternity brother, and a second-year political science student.

Gelberg notes that Francisco not only has a lot of spirit but makes sure that the tour groups leave UCLA with a good impression.

"He is dedicated to showing how great of a place UCLA is to the rest of Los Angeles and the country," Gelberg said.

Outside of tours, Francisco also handles extra staffing issues and this year has worked a lot with the computers in the office.

"My major contribution has been the computerized reservation system," he said. After months of research and fixing problems, the new system is not only working but has simplified the reservation process.

A housing tour is also in the works. "The current tour only shows campus," he said, "but in the future we will be taking them into student rooms so they can get the whole experience."

Francisco will graduate at the end of this quarter but has decided to continue to work spring quarter with campus tours.

After finishing at UCLA, Francisco has big plans. The Monday after graduation he is leaving for a five-week vacation in Europe. Then in September, his accounting minor will go to work for him at the Arthur Anderson accounting firm, where one day he hopes to become a junior partner.

Before Francisco leaves UCLA to travel and work, he has one last dying wish. "I just want to say congratulations to the men's soccer team," he says with a grin.

record their data differently, even from year to year, making comparisons almost impossible. A drop in fatalities attributed to drunken driving could be affected by the number of troopers patroling highways or the refusal of some crash survivors to take breath or blood-alcohol tests. A jump in the number of deaths could reflect the greater numbers of drivers and cars in a state, or trends such as longer commutes or work shifts that end later.

The senators leading the drive to make 0.08 percent the federal blood-alcohol limit cited complex research that does indicate clear drops in drunken driving fatalities. The studies differ from state data by figuring in the likelihood of underreporting and by comparing alcohol-related crashes to all accidents.

Police and state highway officials are far from troubled over the lack of any direct correlation between the lower alcohol limit and highway deaths. Indeed, they say they support the 0.08 limit for two reasons: It makes sense, and it changes attitudes.

"The big benefit from it has been that ... a lot of people who stopped by a bar after work and had four, five, six drinks, now they stop and think about it," said Capt. Roy Smith of the Alabama Department of Public Safety.

The less alcohol consumed by drivers the better, said Virginia state police Lt. Glenn Milliner.

"From my perspective, why do we tolerate it at all?" he said of drinking and driving. "In our society, when we know alcohol affects our driving ability, why does society accept it at all?"

Among the most prominent studies on 0.08 laws are three done by Boston University's School of Public Health.

One study sought to determine the effectiveness of the 0.08 level independent of other regional influences. It looked at five pairs of neighboring states, one with 0.08 percent, the other with 0.10, and found the more restrictive states had 16 percent to 18 percent fewer drunken driving fatalities after the law took effect.

The researchers additionally predicted that if all states adopted 0.08, there would be at least 500 fewer fatal crashes a year.

A second study adjusted state statistics the way federal highway surveys do, looking at each crash to see if alcohol was a likely factor, even if the drivers were not tested. If, for example, a nighttime crash involved only one car, the survey assumes the driver was impaired and the crash is classified as alcohol-related.

To assess attitudes, a third BU study surveyed Massachusetts drivers before and after the 0.08 law took effect in 1994. Heavy drinkers held to their belief that they could drive safely after four or more drinks. The percentage of drivers who felt they could take the wheel legally after drinking that much fell from 34 percent to 20 percent, and the people who acknowledged driving after drinking that much went from 39 percent to 29 percent.

"We said, 'OK, that's interesting;' it's not changing attitudes about what's safe, but they've learned they could get caught," said Ralph Hingson of BU's Social and Behavioral Sciences Department, who directed the study.

Not being able to prove that the 0.08 standard saves lives is no reason not to support it, say safety officials.

account."

But Lamberth did not specify how the award was to be collected. Flatow family lawyers said they plan to go after Iranian assets in the United States and elsewhere.

The United States froze Iranian assets valued at $12 billion in 1979. Most of the funds, however, are controlled by the Iran-United States Claims Tribunal in The Hague, Netherlands, a group of nine judges who decide claims against both Iran and the United States. The United States itself has jurisdiction over only a fraction of the assets, mostly real estate.

Two years ago, the United States agreed to pay $131.8 million in a settlement to families of Iranians killed on a civilian airliner shot down by the U.S. Navy in 1988. All 290 passengers aboard that flight were killed.

Steven Perles, a lawyer for the Flatow family, said the money could either come from the frozen funds or from Iranian assets in other nations that have arrangements with the United States to recognize rulings by each other's courts.

"Iran is a wealthy country with lots of assets, and when you have assets, you have targets" Perles said. "Wherever we can find them, we can go and ask the authorities to attach them on the basis of a binding judgment by a U.S. court."

In Gaza City, a spokesman for Islamic Jihad dismissed the ruling and denied the movement is funded by Iran or any other country.

"This is a big joke, because thousands of Palestinians have been killed during the past 50 years without anyone caring about them or about their family," said Mohammed Said, a leader of the group.

Similar lawsuits are pending against the Libyan government, its intelligence agency and two of its intelligence officers as a result of the 1988 bombing of Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, that killed 270 people.

"Part of what we're trying to do by law was to impose a severe penalty on countries that would engage in this kind of thing, and immediately Pan Am 103 springs to mind," said Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., one of the sponsors of the antiterrorism legislation.

was changing from the traditional urban center, to a community that far outreaches the stretch of its geographical boundaries.

For the administration at UCLA, the international exchange and international relations programs are playing key roles in the development of UCLA as a center for international commerce.

The growing importance of the center may have something to do with Chancellor Carnesale's affinity for international relations and his continuous assertion that he is committed to diversity.

Carnesale worked closely with the guest of honor while dean at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard.

Carnesale cited Harman's innovative use of science and technology in the field of public policy as reasons why Harman stood out while he was at Harvard.

"We live in the new, real, believe-it-or-not digital world."

Sydney Harman
Businessman

In addition to the Harvard connection, the two men have had similar experience in the political arena as well. Carnesale was on the board during the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty (SALT) and Harman was U.S. Deputy Secretary of Commerce under Jimmy Carter.

On top of honoring Harman, the event, put on by the Dashew International Center at UCLA, was staged in order to raise funds for the upcoming Bradley International Building.

While the building itself has already been paid for, the money raised from the event is going to aid in the operational costs of the Bradley Building.

With diplomats from Greece, China, Korea, Japan, and Australia intermingling, it seems that the evening was accomplishing the task that the Bradley building was designed to serve: To bring different people together.

DEPORTED

but we remain completely in the dark."

The Iraqis were members of either the Iraqi National Congress or Iraqi National Accord, groups whose members were Shiites and Kurds bitterly opposed to Hussein.

These groups, operating in northern Iraq's no-fly zone, were backed by the CIA as part of a reported $20 million effort by the U.S. government to overthrow or weaken Hussein after the 1991 Gulf War.

After Hussein's troops swept through northern Iraq, thousands of opposition members and their families were evacuated from Iraq on U.S. military transport planes.

But these six men were among a handful who were detained by the United States as suspected security risks.

The men say they believe they were victimized by statements from enemies within the fractured Iraqi resistance.

PETROGLYPH

highway considered a key thoroughfare on the city's burgeoning west side.

Domenici said the highway's extension, which would cut through 8.5 acres on the park's northern boundary, would have a minuscule effect on the national monument.

"The majority of people in Albuquerque know it won't cause any damage to the petroglyphs," Domenici said. "This is a victory for a compelling number of people ... that would like to get along in helping transportation needs of the west side."

The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee approved the proposal on a voice vote, sending it to the full Senate.

Domenici said he expects the legislation to pass the Senate and to be signed into law with little debate. The House also would have to pass the measure.

But even if the bill is signed by the president, the extension must still be approved by the city of Albuquerque.

"We are extremely disappointed that (Senator) Bingaman would let this road be built."

Dave Simon
Regional director

The highway is backed by the City Council and most of New Mexico's congressional delegation. But Mayor Jim Baca, several Indian tribes and some 40 organizations oppose it.

"The bill has a long way to go before it reaches the president's desk," Baca said Wednesday. "Should it make it through the full Senate and House, I will urge the president to veto the bill."

Conservationists have pinned their hopes on New Mexico Sen. Jeff Bingaman to stop the bill in the Senate. But the Democratic senator hasn't made a strong stand on the issue.

Bingaman voted against the bill during Wednesday's committee hearing, saying he wants to give the National Park Service more say in the road design to help reduce its impact on the petroglyphs.

If that difference is resolved, Bingaman said, he would support the road extension.

Simon said Bingaman's constituents should demand more from him.

"We are extremely disappointed that Bingaman would let this road be built. He is ignoring his constituents," Simon said.

The new road would bring auto and noise pollution from more than 24,000 cars a day, Simon said, ruining the sanctity and solitude of the petroglyphs for anyone who visits that area.

Less than a year ago, the All Indian Pueblo Council unanimously opposed road extensions through the monument. But now some tribes appear to be backing off their opposition, said Malcom Montoya, lands director for Sandia Pueblo, which opposes the roads.

Montoya would not say which tribes had backed away, but said he believes some fear cuts in congressional funding if they oppose Domenici, who chairs the powerful Senate Appropriations Committee.

Domenici's office denies there has ever been any threat of funding cuts.

ed entities," Maldonado said. "I don't think they should bear the burden of the maintenance of Kerckhoff."

"It would be unfair to impose this cost on the student governments," he continued.

It has not yet been determined how much of the $50,000 each government will owe, but USAC will owe more than GSA because it occupies more space, according to ASUCLA Student Union Director Jerry Mann.

Mann said that the reason for the fee is that ASUCLA has unfairly had to pay the maintenance and utilities fees for the common areas in the ASUCLA buildings.

"The student union was bearing a disproportionate amount of the maintenance and utilities fees," Mann said.

The allocation of the fee must still be approved by the ASUCLA Board of Directors when it determines its budget for next year. Many members of the student majority board have reservations in regards to charging the student governments this fee.

Friedman feels that ASUCLA should not charge the student governments extra fees when it is already making money. The first year the organization is scheduled to be in the black (fiscal year 1999-2000) is the first year that the governments will begin to be charged the entire fee.

"The basis for the charge is debatable in my mind," he said.

Tim Beasley, a graduate representative on the board, said that he has not yet formulated an opinion, although he feels that it is necessary for the board to represent the interests of the students and the association.

Maldonado is confident that the board can work with the management staff in order to solve the problem.

"I'm sure that together we can work hard to find a reasonable solution to this issue," he said.

Undergraduate representative Lung-Chi Lee is concerned that the fees will take a lot of money away from the student governments because they represent about one third of the governments' entire budgets.

"That's a big chunk of money," Lee said. "I don't think that the students will take it that well."

Despite the student representatives' views, administrative representative Anita Cotter is in support of the fee.

"I'm in favor of the plan ... because otherwise the association is continuing to subsidize the governments," Cotter said.

GSA President Andrew Westall understands ASUCLA management's reasons for wanting to impose the fee, but does not know how GSA will pay it, since it is such a big part of the budget.

USAC Facilities Commissioner An Le does not think it is fair to charge the student governments for the maintenance of the Kerckhoff common areas because ASUCLA's purpose is to help students.

"Considering that ASUCLA's mission is to serve students, I don't think it would be right to charge the student governments because we're not profit-generating entities," Le said.

"If they can find the money to build new restaurants, I think they can find the money they need to maintain the common areas instead of charging us," she continued.

influential House Budget Committee Chairman John Kasich, R-Ohio, signed another one.

Gingrich told reporters he might let the issue come to the House floor for a vote. Congressional leaders would like to send the legislation to Clinton by early April.

The fight mirrors another battle that still rages among Republicans over how big a tax cut they should propose this year.

Some moderates, such as Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, want to limit the tax cuts to about $30 billion over five years, arguing that a bigger package would eat into budget surpluses that must be preserved.

But conservatives want reductions at least twice that size, saying that dramatic tax cuts are the party's signature issue and a big winner among Republican voters.

Meanwhile, Republicans said their House leaders now plan to let a fight over abortion policy complicate a second bill providing billions for the International Monetary Fund and the United Nations.

Clinton wants $1 billion to pay overdue U.S. dues to the United Nations, plus $17.9 billion for the IMF, which has been battling to keep several Asian economies afloat. That bill is unpopular among Republicans.

But Wednesday, its prospects became even dimmer when House GOP leaders prepared to attach to it a provision prohibiting U.S. funds for groups that lobby to liberalize overseas abortion laws.

The abortion language is already part of a separate bill reorganizing the State Department, but if Clinton, as expected, vetoes that bill, the abortion provision would be attached to the U.N.-IMF legislation, Republicans said.

"Our leadership made it very clear that IMF is dead and arrearages (to the United Nations) is dead" if Clinton won't accept the abortion language, said Rep. Christopher Smith, R-N.J., a leader of anti-abortion lawmakers.

A standoff over the same abortion language last year contributed to the death of Clinton's effort to get "fast-track" trade agreement powers, which would have given him authority to negotiate trade deals that can only be approved or rejected but not amended by Congress.

Roth said that when he visits Vietnam in May, he will raise the issue of the Montagnards, a mountain people recruited by the U.S. military to conduct guerrilla operations during the Vietnam War. "I want to pledge to you that I will undertake a personal effort ... in my conversations with the Vietnamese to try to open up greater benefits for these people in Vietnam," Roth told the committee.

Granting a waiver is a step toward granting most-favored-nation trade status to Vietnam although other legal requirements would delay the process for a year or so.

Administration officials have said two issues influenced their decision to seek the waiver: continued progress in resolving POW-MIA cases and Hanoi's cooperation with a special U.S. program aimed at resettling Vietnamese refugees.

Pro-Montagnards groups said that was not enough. "The U.S. administration has completely ignored this Kafkaesque situation that it has helped to create. Victims of persecution must get approval from their persecutors in order to escape from persecution," asserted Thang.

THUMBS UP THUMBS DOWN

Senate passes bond measure

Thumbs up to the State Senate, which approved an unprecedented $9.2 billion school and university bond measure last Tuesday. The bond passed 28-6, one vote more than the two-thirds majority needed for approval by the senate. The bill is now on its way to the state assembly, but it faces slim chances of passing there.

State officials have said that California is in need of $30 billion to $40 billion to repair and expand school facilities.

All six votes against the bill came from Republicans, including Gov. Wilson, and the remaining five Republicans voted with the Democrat majority. Democrats argued that since interest rates are low, now is a good time for the state to borrow money by selling bonds. They also emphasized the need for schools across California to repair and build new classrooms, and also noted that polled voters said they were willing to approve a bond proposal for schools.

It's refreshing to hear that the citizens of the state are willing to invest in schools and education.

Recycling plan turns new leaf

Thumbs up to the increasing number of universities with sizeable recycling programs. Among the latest schools to adopt a large-scale recycling program is Oklahoma University. OU President David Boren announced a comprehensive plan for campus-wide recycling, prompted by earth-friendly students nearly five years ago. Students and OU Earth members researched and introduced the issue to an advisory committee last fall. The Recycling Advisory Committee, made of students, faculty and staff members, worked toward drafting a final plan to give to Boren. The plan includes seven products – paper, aluminum, cardboard, glass, newspaper, plastic and steel cans.

UCLA needs to adopt a more comprehensive program as well. Maybe it should take its cue from OU, Loyola Marymount and other responsible universities across the country.

Thumbs Up/Thumbs Down represents a majority opinion of the Daily Bruin Editorial Board. Please send comments or suggestions to viewpoint@media.ucla.edu.

Time to look past interracial barriers

MARRIAGE: Crossing over color lines is first step to accepting miscegenation

Sonia Ortega

I believe that interracial relationships are one of the last unspoken taboos in our society. It's hard to grasp this fact in Los Angeles. It's hard to see it on the UCLA campus. But if your eyes are trained, you can see it all around you. I'm lucky that I grew up in a multicultural environment and had friends of all different races. My parents are an interracial couple, and I never thought twice about my crush on the blondest guy in school. But when I got to junior high I noticed all the cliques based on race, and in high school the divisions only grew deeper.

It always saddens me when people tell me they have to marry someone of the same race or same religion as themselves. There is the old saying: Similarity leads to compatibility, dissimilarity to incompatibility. Any fourth-grader could digest this bit of logic, but I would like to think that adult men and women realize which similarities really matter and which dissimilarities are minor concerns.

Racial prejudice is so tightly woven into our collective history that it is hard to talk about the present without reflecting on the past. The colonial white man's treatment of Native Americans, followed by the barbaric enslavement of Africans, is still a painful wound in our society. It is very strange that a culture which felt superior in every way needed to pass laws forbidding miscegenation. Even stranger was the fact that most laws only discussed the African American and hardly ever mentioned the Native American. One sociologist believes that perceived penis size and sexual competence is the reason.

The Civil War and its ensuing period produced a great deal of anti-miscegenation literature and propaganda. The Ku Klux Klan was founded during this period; one of its reasons of coming into being was to stop miscegenation among ordinary people. General Hugh Johnson, who was in charge of conscription during World War I, said that queries about racial antecedents had to be abandoned because so many white Southerners committed suicide when they discovered they had Negro ancestors. Funny, since it was white slave owners who crossed the color line in the first place. Segregation in the streets; integration between the sheets.

As recently as 1967, 16 states had laws against miscegenation on the books. Even good, old California had laws against miscegenation at one point, but to our credit we were the first state to challenge the constitutionality of such laws with Perez vs. Sharp in 1949, when the state Supreme Court struck down our miscegenation statute. It's mind-boggling to think that only a generation ago my parents couldn't have been married in certain states.

There's always the refrain, "What about the children?" Really, we're fine. The problems that stem from being multiracial are not inherent to the mingling of bloods, but rather come from living in a society which cannot see past the rigid color lines established here hundreds of years ago. I admit that there are issues I must deal with that are difficult, and that people who are of one race will never have to think about certain issues. But the blessings that come from having the wealth of two cultures far outweigh any negative aspects that a narrow-minded society can inflict.

Many people prattle on about racial purity and cultural preservation when they argue against interracial relationships and marriages. People who talk like this are only fooling themselves. The continents of North and South America especially have been subject to a great deal of racial mixing, from the first Asians to cross the Bering Strait to the European settlers who sailed the ocean, to the Africans who were brought here in chains, to the immigrants who continue to arrive every day. Even religion is influenced by the changing times, and to think that somehow you can preserve it by only marrying people of the same faith is an exercise in futility.

Let's look at some anthropological facts. Each living person today – if we go 10 generations back – can count over 1,000 ancestors. We, going 20 generations back, can each count over a million, and with 30 generations back the number tops one billion. I did the math myself on this one, and my math nerd brother can confirm that these staggering numbers are right. It is ludicrous to think that marrying someone of the same race or culture actually matters in this vast net of human relations.

What does matter is finding someone who can be a suitable lifetime partner. And for many people, suitable means belonging to a certain race, practicing a certain religion or sharing a certain code of beliefs. There's something to be said for having things in common, and in all honesty, I do feel an affinity toward people who are also racially mixed.

But this is not the same as blatant prejudice.

Interracial relationships are so frustrating to talk about because many people won't admit that they are against it. In certain groups opposition is more vocal, but usually one has to look past the words to see how people really feel about miscegenation. It is almost refreshing as it is repulsive where people blatantly say they won't date someone from such and such group, or they will only get involved with such and such people. At least a dialogue can then take place.

It is folly on my part to assume that everyone who is dating someone of the same race is prejudiced in some way. It is rash to assume that people whose friends are all of the same race, culture or ethnicity is somehow denying themselves of the richness to be gained by befriending people other than themselves. People make decisions and everyone has preferences. We are far from a race-blind society, and many would argue that this is a good thing.

After all, who wants to be washed away into oblivion? There is a crucial balance to be struck between an identity through culture and an identity of independence. And although I don't really connect with clubs and cliques whose membership is based on race, I do see the need for these types of organizations. But this can't be the only way in which identity is forged. We must also look past this and see people for human beings, individuals with tastes and traits that are not always a direct result of their ethnicity.

Harrassment policy fails to protect victims

UNIVERSITY: Students must take initiative to alter UCLA's fallible, lengthy investigation procedure

By Darnell Grisby

UCLA's campus sexual-harassment policy should be changed, as it is overzealous in its attempts to protect members of the Academic Senate from false sexual harassment accusations.

We all understand the importance of wanting to protect members of the university community from unfair attacks, but many of us feel that the university has jeopardized the rights of the victim in the process.

Sexual harassment cases are rarely solved within a year and can actually still be in litigation once the victim has graduated. Three separate committees must do their own investigation of complaints involving professors who are members of the Academic Senate – adding an unnecessary layer of bureaucracy to the process.

To add insult to injury, victims are not informed of the outcome of their cases; the resolutions to the problems are not reported. Students have no idea whether the accused is simply being patted on the wrist or shipped to Siberia.

Even worse, leaks in the process often turn to haunt those who accuse popular professors of harassment.

In the past, supporters of accused professors have given students a hard time, sometimes making a change of department or major necessary. This is further dramatized when students find themselves not getting fellowships or adequate support for their thesis.

Furthermore, if students would like to file their complaints with an off-campus government authority, they will have to do so before their UCLA case is solved because, chances are, the statute of limitations would have passed by the time UCLA finally comes up with a decision.

Students are not the only ones who have suffered under the current policy. Just a few days ago the Daily Bruin reported on a case in which a staff person was allegedly harassed by students. However the university failed to adequately address the situation.

However, if you make administrators aware of the problems inherent in their policies they will act as though they know nothing about the problems. Evidently, they are not listening to or are not aware of the problems that students and the staff face.

One does not need a doctorate to recognize the problems in the policy, but it does take the political will. They need to streamline the process by eliminating the number of investigations to help reduce the time that both sides are kept in limbo. Make the alleged victim aware of the outcome and the punishments that will be levied against the accused. We can protect the privacy of the accused without creating a secret society that shuts out the victim.

The university should also move away from allowing the fox to guard the chicken coop. Why are professors deciding the fate of their colleagues? Does this not contribute to the leaks that are so damaging for both sides, particularly the student victim? Why not have the entire process handled by a committee without professors or the politics that they will inadvertently bring?

These few changes may be difficult to make because the politics of the university make any substantial change very difficult. By altering the policy, administrators will be open to the ire of faculty members who want to take advantage of the privileges that the current system provides.

For those faculty members who think change is good, they may find that their colleagues are far less receptive and are willing to fight to maintain the current system. This is where the importance of student input comes into play.

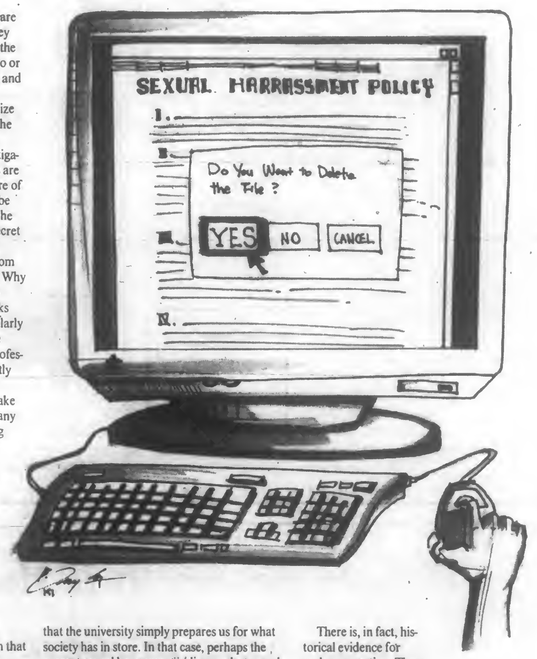
It should be absolutely abhorrent that someone in a position of authority would be able to use students for his or her own purposes. Far too often, the system that we pay for fails to adequately represent our viewpoints and serve to create the futures that we want.

Demanding self-determination at the university allows us to take the resources from the university and bring them back for our uplift. In third-world countries, people are fighting for access to resources so that they may be used for a better standard of living. In the same way, we are fighting for the opportunity to have resources that are useful to us and to our communities.

Many feel that the university is directly opposed to such self-determination. They feel that the university simply prepares us for what society has in store. In that case, perhaps the current sexual harassment policy works toward that goal of preparing us for workplace harassment just as the curriculum prepares us for the benefits of corporate America, instead of benefitting poor, inner-city communities.

It is therefore an uphill battle; how do we as a student community use the current system as our springboard when it is the very thing that is oppressing us?

In order for real change to occur in our communities, we must change the educational system. This change is the most important tool in making education work for the community, not for just the individual.



There is, in fact, historical evidence for such an assertion. There is a history of students questioning the functioning of their university and their place in it, and this questioning helps to change our society.

It is now time that we continue to question our educational system and the way that it handles conflicts such as sexual harassment. This is important because the way a system deals with conflict reveals much about the truths that govern it.

The way our beloved university deals with

Education basics are lacking in school

Daniel Inlender's article, "It's time to look beyond the numbers," (March 10) misses an important point: Students today are not getting the basic education that they need. In the three years I have attended UCLA, I have not noticed that many students have a deficit in the area of experiencing life. I have, however, noticed that most of us have gaping holes in our knowledge of history, philosophy, literature and geography. Many people I have met have difficulty adding in their heads. This is not to say that these students lack intelligence, but that many of us have not been forced to do enough reading and memorizing in school. While there is no substitute for actually experiencing life, this kind of experience cannot replace the kind of knowledge books and classes can offer.

Rally coverage contained errors

Your coverage of the March 6 demonstration against the presence of 36,000 U.S. troops in the Middle East and the deadly sanctions which have killed 1.5 million people in Iraq, "Students voice opposition to sanctions," contained the following errors:

1. It reports that there were "50 to 200 onlookers" when there were 200 to 300 participants. USAC: Members care more about themselves than sanctions in Iraq

By Roee Ruttenberg

I would like to applaud USAC President Kandea Mosley and USAC External Vice-President Stacy Lee for their productive efforts to once again fool the Bruin community in sponsoring and promoting unenlightened squabble on Thursday at Meyerhoff Park and throughout the UCLA campus.

"U.S. Out of Iraq!" they chanted. But I ask you, Ms. Mosley and Ms. Lee, what exactly do you know about the topic? How much studying have you done on the region? Exactly which Middle-Eastern studies class or American Foreign Policy course have you ever taken? I have taken my share, and I can tell you that most of your information is wrong.

Bruins, do not be fooled so easily. It is my opinion that Ms. Mosley and Ms. Lee have no intention of promoting the educational interests of all UCLA students.

I believe that Kandea and Stacy are only interested in promoting themselves. The despicable display Thursday of "Freedom of Speech" was a show, a play on the USAC stage. Why hasn't there been a rally against sanctions on Iraq prior to this?

> Students First! needs more constituents to get re-elected and will go to any length to find them.

Last time I checked, the sanctions weren't a new thing. And, true, 4,500 children have died each year in Iraq since the sanctions were imposed, but the same amount were dying before the sanctions were imposed. So why the sudden interest? Is it coincidental that such an incident always springs up come spring quarter?

I want to inform students who were not here last year for UCLA's annual production of "USAC Elections." Spring quarter is the time for tempers to flare, accusations to be flung, and Students' First! to begin playing what I perceive to be their deceptive games. I say to Kandea and Stacy, the heads of Students First!, like I said before, I commend your efforts to start the game well ahead of time. Most students have not even taken their seats, and they have already started Act I, Scene I.

But why so early? As "allegations" of corruption and unethical behavior

THUMBS UP THUMBS DOWN

Senate passes bond measure

Thumbs up to the State Senate, which approved an unprecedented $9.2 billion school and university bond measure last Tuesday. The bond passed 28-6, one vote more than the two-thirds majority needed for approval by the senate. The bill is now on its way to the state assembly, but it faces slim chances of passing there.

State officials have said that California is in need of $30 billion to $40 billion to repair and expand school facilities.

All six votes against the bill came from Republicans, including Gov. Wilson, and the remaining five Republicans voted with the Democrat majority. Democrats argued that since interest rates are low, now is a good time for the state to borrow money by selling bonds. They also emphasized the need for schools across California to repair and build new classrooms, and also noted that polled voters said they were willing to approve a bond proposal for schools.

It's refreshing to hear that the citizens of the state are willing to invest in schools and education.

Recycling plan turns new leaf

Thumbs up to the increasing number of universities with sizeable recycling programs. Among the latest schools to adopt a large-scale recycling program is Oklahoma University. OU President David Boren announced a comprehensive plan for campus-wide recycling, prompted by earth-friendly students nearly five years ago. Students and OU Earth members researched and introduced the issue to an advisory committee last fall. The Recycling Advisory Committee, made of students, faculty and staff members, worked toward drafting a final plan to give to Boren. The plan includes seven products – paper, aluminum, cardboard, glass, newspaper, plastic and steel cans.

UCLA needs to adopt a more comprehensive program as well. Maybe it should take its cue from OU, Loyola Marymount and other responsible universities across the country.

Time to look past interracial barriers

MARRIAGE: Crossing over color lines is first step to accepting miscegenation

Sonia Ortega

I believe that interracial relationships are one of the last unspoken taboos in our society. It's hard to grasp this fact in Los Angeles. It's hard to see it on the UCLA campus. But if your eyes are trained, you can see it all around you. I'm lucky that I grew up in a multicultural environment and had friends of all different races. My parents are an interracial couple, and I never thought twice about my crush on the blondest guy in school. But when I got to junior high I noticed all the cliques based on race, and in high school the divisions only grew deeper.

It always saddens me when people tell me they have to marry someone of the same race or same religion as themselves. There is the old saying: Similarity leads to compatibility, dissimilarity to incompatibility. Any fourth-grader could digest this bit of logic, but I would like to think that adult men and women realize which similarities really matter and which dissimilarities are minor concerns.

Racial prejudice is so tightly woven into our collective history that it is hard to talk about the present without reflecting on the past. The colonial white man's treatment of Native Americans, followed by the barbaric enslavement of Africans, is still a painful wound in our society. It is very strange that a culture which felt superior in every way needed to pass laws forbidding miscegenation. Even stranger was the fact that most laws only discussed the African American and hardly ever mentioned the Native American. One sociologist believes that perceived penis size and sexual competence is the reason.

The Civil War and its ensuing period produced a great deal of anti-miscegenation literature and propaganda. The Ku Klux Klan was founded during this period; one of its reasons of coming into being was to stop miscegenation among ordinary people. General Hugh Johnson, who was in charge of conscription during World War I, said that queries about racial antecedents had to be abandoned because so many white Southerners committed suicide when they discovered they had Negro ancestors. Funny, since it was white slave owners who crossed the color line in the first place. Segregation in the streets; integration between the sheets.

As recently as 1967, 16 states had laws against miscegenation on the books. Even good, old California had laws against miscegenation at one point, but to our credit we were the first state to challenge the constitutionality of such laws with Perez vs. Sharp in 1949, when the state Supreme Court struck down our miscegenation statute. It's mind-boggling to think that only a generation ago my parents couldn't have been married in certain states.

There's always the refrain, "What about the children?" Really, we're fine. The problems that stem from being multiracial are not inherent to the mingling of bloods, but rather come from living in a society which cannot see past the rigid color lines established here hundreds of years ago. I admit that there are issues I must deal with that are difficult, and that people who are of one race will never have to think about certain issues. But the blessings that come from having the wealth of two cultures far outweigh any negative aspects that a narrow-minded society can inflict.

Many people prattle on about racial purity and cultural preservation when they argue against interracial relationships and marriages. People who talk like this are only fooling themselves. The continents of North and South America especially have been subject to a great deal of racial mixing, from the first Asians to cross the Bering Strait to the European settlers who sailed the ocean, to the Africans who were brought here in chains, to the immigrants who continue to arrive every day. Even religion is influenced by the changing times, and to think that somehow you can preserve it by only marrying people of the same faith is an exercise in futility.

Let's look at some anthropological facts. Each living person today – if we go 10 generations back – can count over 1,000 ancestors. We, going 20 generations back, can each count over a million, and with 30 generations back the number tops one billion. I did the math myself on this one, and my math nerd brother can confirm that these staggering numbers are right. It is ludicrous to think that marrying someone of the same race or culture actually matters in this vast net of human relations.

What does matter is finding someone who can be a suitable lifetime partner. And for many people, suitable means belonging to a certain race, practicing a certain religion or sharing a certain code of beliefs. There's something to be said for having things in common, and in all honesty, I do feel an affinity toward people who are also racially mixed.

But this is not the same as blatant prejudice.

Interracial relationships are so frustrating to talk about because many people won't admit that they are against it. In certain groups opposition is more vocal, but usually one has to look past the words to see how people really feel about miscegenation. It is almost refreshing as it is repulsive where people blatantly say they won't date someone from such and such group, or they will only get involved with such and such people. At least a dialogue can then take place.

It is folly on my part to assume that everyone who is dating someone of the same race is prejudiced in some way. It is rash to assume that people whose friends are all of the same race, culture or ethnicity is somehow denying themselves of the richness to be gained by befriending people other than themselves. People make decisions and everyone has preferences. We are far from a race-blind society, and many would argue that this is a good thing.

After all, who wants to be washed away into oblivion? There is a crucial balance to be struck between an identity through culture and an identity of independence. And although I don't really connect with clubs and cliques whose membership is based on race, I do see the need for these types of organizations. But this can't be the only way in which identity is forged. We must also look past this and see people for human beings, individuals with tastes and traits that are not always a direct result of their ethnicity.

Harrassment policy fails to protect victims

UNIVERSITY: Students must take initiative to alter UCLA's fallible, lengthy investigation procedure

By Darnell Grisby

UCLA's campus sexual-harassment policy should be changed, as it is overzealous in its attempts to protect members of the Academic Senate from false sexual harassment accusations.

We all understand the importance of wanting to protect members of the university community from unfair attacks, but many of us feel that the university has jeopardized the rights of the victim in the process.

Sexual harassment cases are rarely solved within a year and can actually still be in litigation once the victim has graduated. Three separate committees must do their own investigation of complaints involving professors who are members of the Academic Senate – adding an unnecessary layer of bureaucracy to the process.

To add insult to injury, victims are not informed of the outcome of their cases ; the resolutions to the problems are not reported. Students have no idea whether the accused is simply being patted on the wrist or shipped to Siberia.

Even worse, leaks in the process often turn to haunt those who accuse popular professors of harassment.

In the past, supporters of accused professors have given students a hard time, sometimes making a change of department or major necessary. This is further dramatized when students find themselves not getting fellowships or adequate support for their thesis.

Furthermore, if students would like to file their complaints with an off-campus government authority, they will have to do so before their UCLA case is solved because, chances are, the statute of limitations would have passed by the time UCLA finally comes up with a decision.

Students are not the only ones who have suffered under the current policy. Just a few days ago the Daily Bruin reported on a case in which a staff person was allegedly harassed by students. However the university failed to adequately address the situation.

However, if you make administrators aware of the problems inherent in their policies they will act as though they know nothing about the problems. Evidently, they are not listening to or are not aware of the problems that students and the staff face.

One does not need a doctorate to recognize the problems in the policy, but it does take the political will. They need to streamline the process by eliminating the number of investigations to help reduce the time that both sides are kept in limbo. Make the alleged victim aware of the outcome and the punishments that will be levied against the accused. We can protect the privacy of the accused without creating a secret society that shuts out the victim.

The university should also move away from allowing the fox to guard the chicken coop. Why are professors deciding the fate of their colleagues? Does this not contribute to the leaks that are so damaging for both sides, particularly the student victim? Why not have the entire process handled by a committee without professors or the politics that they will inadvertently bring?

These few changes may be difficult to make because the politics of the university make any substantial change very difficult. By altering the policy, administrators will be open to the ire of faculty members who want to take advantage of the privileges that the current system provides.

For those faculty members who think change is good, they may find that their colleagues are far less receptive and are willing to fight to maintain the current system. This is where the importance of student input comes into play.

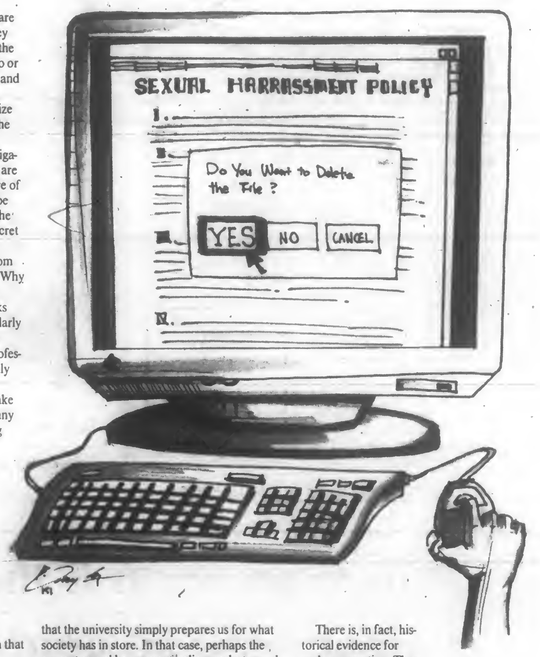
It should be absolutely abhorrent that someone in a position of authority would be able to use students for his or her own purposes. Far too often, the system that we pay for fails to adequately represent our viewpoints and serve to create the futures that we want.

Demanding self-determination at the university allows us to take the resources from the university and bring them back for our uplift. In third-world countries, people are fighting for access to resources so that they may be used for a better standard of living. In the same way, we are fighting for the opportunity to have resources that are useful to us and to our communities.

Many feel that the university is directly opposed to such self-determination. They feel that the university simply prepares us for what society has in store. In that case, perhaps the current sexual harassment policy works toward that goal of preparing us for workplace harassment just as the curriculum prepares us for the benefits of corporate America, instead of benefitting poor, inner-city communities.

It is therefore an uphill battle; how do we as a student community use the current system as our springboard when it is the very thing that is oppressing us?

In order for real change to occur in our communities, we must change the educational system. This change is the most important tool in making education work for the community, not for just the individual.



There is, in fact, historical evidence for such an assertion. There is a history of students questioning the functioning of their university and their place in it, and this questioning helps to change our society.

It is now time that we continue to question our educational system and the way that it handles conflicts such as sexual harassment. This is important because the way a system deals with conflict reveals much about the truths that govern it.

The way our beloved university deals with

Education basics are lacking in school

Daniel Inlender's article, "It's time to look beyond the numbers," (March 10) misses an important point: Students today are not getting the basic education that they need. In the three years I have attended UCLA, I have not noticed that many students have a deficit in the area of experiencing life. I have, however, noticed that most of us have gaping holes in our knowledge of history, philosophy, literature and geography. Many people I have met have difficulty adding in their heads. This is not to say that these students lack intelligence, but that many of us have not been forced to do enough reading and memorizing in school. While there is no substitute for actually experiencing life, this kind of experience cannot replace the kind of knowledge books and classes can offer.

East and lifting the sanctions that prevent food and medicine from reaching the people of Iraq.

2. Quotes attributed to me belong to Ahmed Shama.

3. My name was spelled incorrectly.

Accurate coverage of this issue is especially crucial in order to counter the chauvinism that pervades public sentiment when American political leaders crow about how the United States must be the cops of the world.

This imperial chauvinism underlies the arrogance and intolerance some elements of the campus have displayed in the past two weeks. Educational posters documenting the impact of the sanctions have been defaced and torn down.

Just for carrying one of these posters across campus, I had one woman shout the following at me: "It's Saddam's problem not ours." I responded that the United States is the main supporter of a military blockade against Iraq and has vowed to veto attempts by the United Nations to end the sanctions. The United States has also led the world in proliferation of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons. She then stated that the United States has the right to build all of the weapons it wants because "we have money."

A male student simply called me a "dick" as he passed by in the Royce Quad. While our campus provides classes, lectures and programs to promote the free exchange of ideas, apparently there are some who prefer to promote their points of view through slander and intimidation. Is this that Bruin spirit that gets talked about so much?

sexual harassment uncovers the historical roots of its existence. The notion that professors will be able to make unbiased decisions about their friends and colleagues is clearly a medieval conception. The notion that the victim should not be notified of the outcome of the case is a conservative anti-victim stance that seeks to save face at all costs.

The passing of the buck and the denials that the university is likely to make when confronted about the issue show their fear of change and accountability.

So how do we as students deal with such a sticky existence? If we are victims of sexual harassment, we must come forward and be willing to weather the possibilities in order to make a better future for those that follow. We must no longer accept the notion that boundaries and models of appropriateness are "P.C."; they are simply a human right.

We must also advocate a new committee that will make changes to the current policy. This committee should have a high percentage of student and staff input, and the representatives should be approved by GSA and USAC. The committee should seek to implement a new, friendlier policy as soon as possible.

Those that are concerned about sexual harassment should make Chancellor Albert Carnesale and Vice Chancellor Winston Doby's offices aware of their concerns and ask that they take action immediately.

If they are interested in serving student needs and interests, they will neither pass the buck nor deny the clear problems but will instead seek to change these problems.

Those who can change the policy are right here on the campus; the political will simply must be there.

RUTTENBERG

in USAC were brought to light, (see, for example, "Students First! accused of campaign fraud," Jan. 29, in which former USAC member Robert Rhoan accuses USAC of illegal campaigning) an unexpected chaos has been caused because of a new rift in Students First! – the political party which controls USAC and its well over one-million-dollar budget. Responsively, Students' First! has kicked off this year's political season early. Students First! needs more constituents to get re-elected and will go to any length to find them. I fail to see how the rally on Iraqi sanctions helped the interests of students on campus. Kandea and her crew, now backed by the Muslim Student Association (yet another endorsing group which can now donate money to the spring campaign), failed to present an educational aspect to the scene. Rather than promoting a display of intellectual exchange between two sides of a differing argument, a UCLA anthropology professor was brought in, who merely spewed out more propaganda with which to divert students' attention from the real issues.

Bruins, don't get me wrong. I am not saying that I am in support of sanctions on Iraq, nor am I saying the opposite. But what I am saying is that UCLA students need to be aware of the questionable motives of your student leaders. How about instead of screaming, "Clinton, Albright, you can't hide," disturbing classes where students are actually learning, you do something productive and fulfill empty promises made last year. What happened to expanding the book-lending program, or helping students deal with the new technology fee? What happened to incorporating the Inter-Fraternity Council and the Panhellenic Council – the two largest Student Advocacy Groups (SAGs) on campus – into USAC? They currently receive no USAC funds – zero, zip. Where is their share of the students' money? Why have they not received anything in the past three years? Why were they turned away from funds when holding a seminar on rape prevention? I ask you, Kandea and Stacy, where were you when they were holding their rallies? What about fighting construction delays (I think De Neve Dr. is still closed by the dorms!), or the closing of Hershey Hall, or inadequate parking for student commuters? What happened to working closely with the Office of Residential Life (ORL) and all of those "meetings on the hill" like you promised? Oh, and congratulations on recently appointing a new election board chair for this school year! Hmm, when was the deadline for that? I believe it was last summer, 1997! Don't you think that the 10 percent of the students on campus that voted for you deserve answers? What have you done for the people here – the people of UCLA? Well at least we know what you have done for yourself – you got a pay raise (ka-ching ka-ching)!

For those of you who want to know about Iraq, ask someone who understands the intricacies of the subject. Take a class that addresses such an issue, perhaps Political Science 120 or HC 97. But do not be brainwashed by student "leaders" who are missing the forest for the trees. If you want to know about Darwin's theories, ask the professor they chose to "educate" the students at the rally. But if you want to know about American politics, foreign policy, and the true nature of the situation in the Middle East, ask a political-science professor. And if you want to see student government really putting "students first," voice yourself with your vote against such behavior. The choice is yours. All I can do is bring it to your attention.

Feminist perspectives add color to history of blues

BOOK: Davis examines role of post slavery music for African Americans

By J. Joni Palmer
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

A bunch of old-timers bumpin' and grindin', drinking moonshine in a juke joint. This image might come to mind when mentioning the blues. "Blues Legacies and Black Feminism," by Angela Y. Davis applies a critical feminist lens to this down-home creation. Davis does so with precision and expertise despite the book's dense historical context.

As the first form of post-slavery music, Davis argues that the blues is essential to understanding the myriad issues confronting the African-American community at that time. At its most basic level, the blues express the newfound freedoms enjoyed by African-Americans. If spirituals (a contemporary rival of the blues) are refined reflections of Black folks' souls, then the blues is a guttural expression of what it is to be Black and poor:

"Emerging during the decades following the abolition of slavery, the blues gave musical expression to the new social and sexual realities encountered by African Americans as free women and men," writes Davis.

"Blues Legacies" vividly demonstrates how the blues grew directly out of the experiences and musical traditions of the slavery era.

"Blues make abundant use of humor, satire, and irony, revealing their historic roots in slave music, wherein indirect methods of expression were the only means by which the oppression of slavery could be denounced.

"In this sense, the blues genre is a direct descendant of work songs, which often relied on indirection and irony to highlight the inhumanity of slave owners so that their targets were sure to misunderstand the intended meaning."

> Davis' ability to notice how even the slightest vocal nuances hold meaning demonstrates her keen listening skills.

Two themes that also permeate the blues include travel and sexuality. Davis surmises that the manifestation of these issues, both severely restricted under slavery, represent African-Americans' desire to explore previously uncharted areas.

Davis, through careful analysis of the lyrics and careers of Gertrude "Ma" Rainey, Bessie Smith and Billie Holiday, explores how these women produced latent expressions of feminist and working-class consciousness.

However, "Blues Legacies and Black Feminism" does not attempt to paint these three artists as rabid advocates of a feminist agenda.

Cognizant that most utterances of feminism were often unbeknownst to the artist, Davis demonstrates how the treatment of so-called private issues like domestic violence and homosexuality belong in the public domain. Davis acknowledges that feminist activists of the '60s and '70s would dismantle the public/private dichotomy:

"The historically omnipresent secrecy and silence regarding male violence is linked to its social construction as a private problem sequestered behind impermeable domestic walls, rather than a social problem deserving political attention."

In addition to prominent themes of travel and sexuality, Davis also alludes to hip-hop. Although she makes only occasional references to the hip-hop music and culture, a close reading of the text will reveal many parallels between these two musical genres. For instance, while examining Bessie Smith's "Poor Man Blues," a song critiquing the economic blight of the Black community, Davis concludes:

"Its impassioned denunciation of injustices would be repeated time and time again across the continuum of black music – in blues, in jazz, in rhythm and blues, in funk and in rap. This pioneering song established social protest themes as legitimate content for African-American popular music."

The identification of the blues as the genesis of social protest in "African-American popular music," recognizes the progressive elements of hip-hop firmly within the tradition of Black music. Other comparisons can also be drawn. For example hip-hop, like the blues, has been dismissed as a "low" cultural expression and often chided for the prevalence of lyrics dealing with sex and violence.

Davis' ability to notice how even the slightest vocal nuances hold meaning demonstrates her keen listening skills. Such attention to detail allows for a fuller examination of the subject matter at hand. Augmenting an already thorough analysis, Davis has included the complete works of Gertrude "Ma" Rainey and Bessie Smith in the appendix.

"Blues Legacies and Black Feminism" is a thorough examination of the blues as rich source of feminist and working-class consciousness in post-slavery Black America. Davis provides invaluable insight into the plethora of issues encountered by African-Americans as they embraced their new freedom.

Israel's Batsheva Dance Company doesn't restrict itself to one style

By Terry Tang
Daily Bruin Contributor

Classifying Batsheva Dance Company in one genre is no easy spin around the dance floor. But the dancers' willingness to stretch the human body to new heights has earned them an audience which spans across the globe.

Journeying from their native land of Israel, Batsheva will take the stage at Veterans Wadsworth Theater this Friday. Although the group always enjoys entertaining a new audience, Batsheva's dancers remain just as focused on pushing themselves physically.

"The emotional state they are in is very important. It is never relaxed," says Ohad Naharin, the group's artistic director and choreographer. "There is a very soft quality sometimes, but there is always an alertness. You can see a cat sleeping but you know that if it just senses you, it will jump."

Famous for high-energy routines, Batsheva often encompasses a mix of styles from ballet to breakdancing.

Combined with music and film accompaniments, Batsheva's shows have often been labeled as modern pop concerts. However, Naharin refuses to let his work fall under the term modern.

"For me, modern was a movement that wanted to abolish the past and start everything new. For me, the past is very important and I think everything we know is because we remember the past – not just dancers, people," explains Naharin. "It gives me reference, information, inspiration."

As choreographer, Naharin teaches the dancers about the importance of researching composition, form and new styles.

"Creating, making up things, was always part of myself. I tested myself with writing, music, sculpture, making up stories," Naharin says. "I always had a passion for it. And when I fell into dance, it was natural that I would start doing that too."

As one of the most famous dance companies in Israel, Batsheva demands a strict schedule of rehearsals and tours from its dancers. With only a one-month summer vacation, dancers spend the rest of the year practicing six days a week, eight to 10 hours a day. The troupe gives at least 90 performances each year.

Batsheva also expects flexibility from its audience. Although some of Naharin's pieces incorporate aspects of Jewish culture, viewers do not need a cultural understanding to enjoy themselves. They do not need a beginning, middle and end in a dance piece to arrive at their own interpretation.

"I like that feeling of dialogue with my audi-

Director hopes to revive Brazilian movie industry

AWARD: Oscar nod for best foreign film could encourage investments

By Stephanie Sheh
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

Even after having made the most successful film ever in Brazil, director Bruno Barreto had to leave the country because he could not make films anymore.

Due to hyper inflation, film production in Brazil came to a standstill and Barreto left for the States. Then after roughly eight years, Barreto returned to Brazil to make "Four Days in September" and got an Academy Award nomination out of it.

This latest film, which is currently playing in theaters, was nominated for Best Picture in the Foreign Film category. The bearded Barreto sat down with the Bruin in the Miramax Los Angeles offices last week to talk about what the nomination means to him and his country.

"God, it means a lot," says Barreto, easing into his chair. "First of all, it pays off when you work your butt off. I spent like 10 years trying to get this film made."

Based on a true event, "Four Days in September" chronicles the standoff that took place when young revolutionaries kidnapped the American Ambassador.

Actor Alan Arkin, who plays the American Ambassador Charles Elbrick, says that what interested him about the film was the fact that at the surface level it is a political thriller, but the audience ends up caring about everyone in the movie.

"You end up having a sense of individuality and purpose of everybody in the film without saying this is a good person and this is a bad person," Arkin explains.

Barreto had to go through 10 years and six different writers in order to create the world of the Brazilian dictatorship's censorship and oppression.

"The dictatorship was heavily supported by the American government at the time," explains Barreto. "That's something that not a lot of people know. So I think that the Oscar nomination enhances and brings attention to a very important subject matter that I wish there were more films made about."

Like Barreto, "Four Days" has a good mix of American and Brazilian elements. The director has made four films here, including "Carried Away" and "A Show of Force."

"It's significant that I got nominated because of the fact that my career is pretty established here before 'Four Days,'" Barreto says, circling his fingers on a table top. "Exactly because of that fact, the nomination is very significant, that they already know me as a director that can make films anywhere."

Though Barreto is still based in America, he has been reading and hearing about what the nomination means to the Brazilian people.

"It's like the World Cup," he says. "It's like soccer."

Barreto says that after the Brazilian B team lost a soccer game a couple of weeks ago, "the morale was very low and when the film was nominated they said, 'Oh yeah, we lost, but we got nominated.' So, that's the way a lot people feel in Brazil."

Since his eight year-departure,

DANCE: Fellowships let students capture essence in their documentaries

By Megan Dickerson
Daily Bruin Contributor

Going down the stairs of UCLA's Fowler building, through the locked door to the poster-strewn dance office and into a space the size of a walk-in closet, one finds dancer Lisa Gross.

Surrounded by monitors, editing switchboards and thick orange cords, she stares intensely at a man on a flickering screen, fast forwarding a tape. In the ninth week of her UCLA National Dance/Media Fellowship to preserve dance on film, Lisa Gross is tired.

"I'm editing a rough sample of the film because our grant proposals are due," says Gross, a Los Angeles dancer, choreographer and filmmaker.

One of eight fellows chosen from across the country, Gross has been developing a documentary of street movement and dance.

"It's an observation of different cultures overlapping, observation of the relationship between strangers," she continues. "(The project) has just been with me for a long time, because my focus was mainly dance and film."

This unique perspective on dance and film is the focus of the 10-week fellowship, which ends next week. Eight members of the dance world, including two UCLA graduate students, participated in a series of intensive workshops administered by the department of World Arts and Cultures.

In an area where documentation is often neglected due to lack of money or time, these dancers-cum-filmmakers are learning to record dance in a way that transmits its essence.

> "Dance is such a visceral experience. You lose that in trying to really deposit work on the screen."
> Jo Parkes
> UCLA dance MFA student

"(Dance) is such a visceral experience, you lose that in trying to really deposit work on the screen," says Jo Parkes, a UCLA dance MFA student and choreographer who has served as a day-to-day point person for the program. "And it is often a poor substitute for the live performance."

The fellowship is one aspect of the "Save As: Dance" partnership, which also encompasses the National Initiative to Preserve America's Dance (NIPAD). While NIPAD preserves already existing film and bestows grants for further work on one hand, the fellowship is the creative side of the partnership. The fellowship provides selected members of the dance community with technical training, research and leadership activities, Parkes says.

Fellows learn new documentation techniques through field work and two or three-day workshops led by distinguished dancers and cinematographers. Using cutting-edge video and editing equipment, they hone their camera skills by shooting undergraduate world arts and cultures dance classes in the morning and analyzing the footage in the afternoon.

"There's so little money in the dance world," says Parkes, who is also a dancer. "The facilities, the cameras and the editing system are so expensive in the real world that the chance to have the time, just when you're not waitressing or doing anything else, just to really do your work, is an amazing gift."

Members of the Los Angeles dance community and the UCLA faculty led multi-day residencies, discussing topics from public broadcasting to lighting and sound.

American distributors turn away from seductive 'Lolita'

MOVIE: Director blames Hollywood's moral cowardice for rejection

By Caryn James
The New York Times

Jeremy Irons has a look of anguished despair on his face, which is splattered with droplets of blood. He slumps against the window as he drives an old wooden-sided station wagon, swerving on and off a country road. In one bloodied hand he holds a bobby pin as if it were the greatest treasure on earth; on the seat beside him is a gun.

Then Humbert Humbert, the man who has loved a 12-year-old girl, begins his long confession. In voice-over, Irons offers the most famous lines from one of the most poetic, romantic novels ever written: "Lolita, light of my life, fire of my loins. My sin, my soul, Lo-lee-ta."

This opening scene of unexpected power sets the tone for Adrian Lyne's film "Lolita." Like Vladimir Nabokov's novel, it is an eloquent tragedy laced with wit and a serious, disturbing work of art.

The latest "Lolita" was rumored to be something different: an overpriced movie about a forbidden subject, and not a very good movie at that. No longer new, the film has yet to be shown to American audiences, though it was finished a year ago.

When I saw it last month at a theater in Paris, there was a disproportionate number of American tourists in the audience, surely aware that the film had been rejected by every major distributor in the United States and might never appear here at all.

Now that the film has opened in several European cities, to mixed reviews and middling box-office returns, its American fate seems more dismal than ever. In recent weeks, Pathe, the French production company that owns the film, has come close to selling it to Showtime, which would make "Lolita" the most expensive, highest-profile film ever to be dumped directly to cable television.

There have been last-ditch efforts by Lyne and his agent, Jeff Berg of ICM, to persuade Pathe to sell "Lolita" to a small American distributor; that would bring the film to theaters in a handful of cities, saving face for the director. Either possibility may still come through. But if "Lolita" is not quite dead, it is,

Studios slowly waking up to increasing Latino audience

DEMOGRAPHICS: Though in the fastest-growing ethnic group of moviegoers, few films addressed to Latinos

By Bernard Weinraub
The New York Times

HOLLYWOOD – Latino moviegoers are the fastest-growing ethnic group among film audiences, an industry report says, and Hollywood studios have begun – some say too slowly – to make movies that appeal to them.

The report, issued Tuesday by the Motion Picture Association of America, the lobbying arm of the movie business, said that ticket sales to Latino people rose 22 percent in 1997. Nationally, Latino moviegoers outnumber African American ones, the report says. "The fastest growing admissions group is Hispanics," said Jack Valenti, the head of the association.

He made his comments in an annual report on the movie business at the yearly convention of theater owners, called Showest, in Las Vegas. The report said movie attendance was at an all-time high, and ticket sales reached a record $6.4 billion last year.

Bill Gerber, co-president for worldwide theatrical production at Warner Brothers, said that last year the success of the film "Selena," in which Jennifer Lopez played the charismatic Tejano singer who was poised on international stardom when she was killed, had made the studio aware of the potential Latino movie audience. The film grossed $35 million, a success, but did not quite cross over into the non-Latino audience.

"The excitement around 'Selena' was overwhelming in the Latino community and around the country," Gerber said. "We're conscious of that audience and the stars that appeal to that audience."

Such stars as Lopez, Salma Hayek and Antonio Banderas have emerged as sought-after performers partly because of their appeal to Latin audi-

Speakers included Michael Kidd, the Tony Award-winning choreographer of "Guys and Dolls" and "Seven Brides for Seven Brothers," and Ken Brecher, director of the Sundance Institute.

The broad expertise of the workshop leaders and fellows, which include an animator and several videographers, lends itself to a revolutionary learning environment, says Sue Fan, assistant director of the Center for Intercultural Performance.

"We're looking at a broader interpretation of dance documentation, in the sense that here we're looking at the relationship between dance and media and also investigating new approaches to dance and its documentation," Fan says. "We're trying to create a place where people really invent and create. We're pushing the boundaries of dance documentation."

The results range from Gross' documentary of street movement to fellow Laura Margulies' animated recording of hula dancing. Fellow Bridget Murnane, a producer, director, writer, teacher and editor from Massachusetts, used the fellowship to work with local choreographers to record dance performances in old movie theaters.

With the success of the program's inaugural year, fellowship director Judith Mitoma, also chair of the world arts and cultures department, considers adding a dance documentation element to the graduate department.

"I feel the fellowship is now an important contribution to the field of dance, as well as to our development of advanced study in dance and film in the department of world arts and cultures," Mitoma says. "The professional equipment will be used in future years by the advanced students, for students seeking advanced degrees in film and video."

As the fellows work to finish their NIPAD grant proposals, the fellowship administrators work to extend the fellowship grant past the year 2000. According to directors, the most far-reaching effects of the program's historical preservation have yet to be seen.

"The future of dance is not going to exist unless we know what the past is," Parks says.

DANCE: The department of world arts and cultures is currently accepting graduate applicants for next year's fellowship, which will take place from January 11 to March 19 of 1999. The application deadline is May 15. For more information on the 1999 Fellowship, contact Ming Ng at 206-1867. The "Save As: Dance" program can also be found on the web, at http://save-as-dance.org/.

Students in our new School of Law will be surrounded by commitment, dedication and 137 years of university tradition.

In the heart of Southern California lies the nation's newest ABA provisionally-approved School of Law.

And, as you might expect with a new, elite program, students at Chapman have access to the best of all that's new: new technology, a new law library, and very soon, a new building in which to house it all.

As part of an established university campus, though, Chapman law students also have the benefit of being part of a century-long tradition of excellence and ethics. It's a tradition that's alive and evident in our faculty, as well as in our students.

If that's something you'd like to be a part of, call Chapman University's School of Law today. When you come to Chapman, you'll surround yourself with all the things you need to become the kind of lawyer our society needs.

LOLITA

like Humbert in the opening scene, bloodied, beaten down and reaching the end of the road. Unlike Humbert, it doesn't deserve this fate.

Lyne blames Hollywood's moral cowardice for the rejection of "Lolita," pointing out, "The community is not renowned for making courageous decisions."

Hollywood distributors blame the quality of the film. "No one liked it enough" is the remarkably consistent, though anonymous, chant from many who turned it down.

> Like Vladimir Nabokov's novel, it is an eloquent tragedy laced with wit and a serious, disturbing work of art.

There is something to both arguments and no single reason for the rejection of "Lolita." And while there is no other case quite like it, the movie's tortured life reveals much about the social climate of the country, about Hollywood and money, and about the dwindling audience for serious art films.

"In Hollywood, if there's a good movie, no matter what's going on in it, somebody's going to buy it," said one of the distributors who disliked the film, arguing that the subject "seemed too real" and wondering, "Who are you going to like in the movie?" Those objections perfectly represent Hollywood's problems with the film.

It's true that the story of Humbert Humbert is not a crowd pleaser. Following the novel faithfully, the film lets Humbert tell of arriving in the New England town of Ramsdale in 1947 and marrying the horrifyingly bourgeois Charlotte Haze (played by Melanie Griffith) to be near her enticing daughter, Lolita (Dominique Swain). When Charlotte dies, Humbert embarks on a sexual relationship and an extended road trip with Lolita.

More important, the film is faithful to Humbert's description of himself as "an artist and a madman," who eventually realizes he has been reprehensible in his treatment of Lolita. But the subtlety and ambiguity of the character demand a sophistication not usually found in movie-marketing campaigns. In Hollywood, "Lolita" was often reduced to nothing more than a movie about sex with a minor.

> "Maybe this is a movie people will come around to."
> Adrian Lyne
> Director

Many distributors noted that the JonBenet Ramsey murder and the child murders by a pedophile in Belgium, cases that hit the headlines when "Lolita" was being shopped around, made the film even trickier to market, presenting the specter of conservative opposition to it. One person whose company passed said of Lolita's character, "In this climate of greater sensitivity, people reacted to her not as a nymphet but as a child."

This is a common response, but a peculiar one. Swain looks like an adolescent, not a little girl. And if anything, it should be easier today to see Lolita as a nymphet rather than a child.

Sexually precocious teenagers are more common in the '90s than they were in 1962, when Stanley Kubrick's "Lolita" appeared. (In that weirdly distorted film, James Mason's Humbert comes across as a dirty old man, leering at Sue Lyon as Lolita.) But the sex-with-a-child theme clearly scared distributors away.

These are not yahoos talking, but business people who had no reason to take a risk on what they saw as a failed movie. "If you're going to offend the parents of America," one of them wryly put it, "you might as well do it with a film you love."

"Lolita" is certainly not flawless. It is dully repetitious in the last 40 minutes as Humbert and Lolita travel the country and he becomes increasingly suspicious that they are being trailed (nothing a deft 15-minute cut in the 2-hour-17-minute film couldn't fix). That weakness is minor when weighed against so many stunning and emotionally-gripping qualities.

The most dazzling is Irons' performance, among his absolute best. One of Nabokov's brilliant choices was to cast the novel as Humbert's memoir, to have him look back with wistfulness, enduring love and horror at his affair with Lolita, and to redeem himself through the beauty of his language. "Oh, my Lolita, I have only words to play with!" he says.

Language is essential to "Lolita," and Irons captures Humbert's voice perfectly. In the Random House audio book, he reads the novel (11 1/2 hours long) with a sensitivity to the language that conveys all of Nabokov's humor, passion and lyricism. (The audio book is one of the movie's great side benefits.)

> In Hollywood, "Lolita" was often reduced to nothing more than a movie about sex with a minor.

But the film avoids the trap of making "Lolita" too literary on screen. Irons' narration flows gracefully in and out of the film, enough to capture Nabokov's poetry but not so much that viewers feel the movie is being explained. His face registers Humbert's conflicting emotions, often of lust and sorrow at the same time. His performance alone would make "Lolita" worthwhile; around him, the movie is filled with visual texture and drama.

When Hollywood decided this film was not good enough, that meant it was not good in a predictable, mainstream way. The audience for "Lolita" is most likely an art-house audience, and that came as a shock. After all, Lyne's track record for commercial hits includes "Flashdance," "Fatal Attraction" and "Indecent Proposal."

With "Lolita," the director's reputation may have boomeranged against him. Nobody expected Mr. Fatal Attraction to turn out an art film; maybe that's why the budget was allowed to mushroom (to more than $50 million), as production took place all over the United States. With its sweeping vistas, its re-creations of tacky tourist motels ("Eat and Sleep in a Teepee" reads one sign), its beautifully photographed small towns, "Lolita" looks extravagant on screen.

But extravagance is the last thing an art film can afford – especially one that cannot be sold on its sex appeal. Sex is not explicitly depicted in the film, which was not necessarily the original idea.

"I sat with a lawyer for six weeks in 1996 in a cutting room," said Lyne, in a conversation about "Lolita" in New York two weeks ago. The 1996 Child Pornography Prevention Act meant that he had to cut scenes that suggested Swain (then 15 years old) was having sex, even though those scenes were filmed with a body double. After that, the film was submitted to the Motion Picture Association of America and got an R rating.

And "Lolita" did not come with the artistic cachet that leads to Academy Award nominations either. It is not a sweeping romance like "The English Patient." Though Irons' performance is at least as good as any nominated this year, what are the odds that he would be nominated for playing Humbert Humbert?

As Lyne says of Humbert: "It's hideous what he does, and at the end of the novel it breaks your heart. People don't want to sympathize with a pedophile." It is hard to imagine the Oscar campaign.

Of course Humbert is disturbing; "Lolita" in all its incarnations is meant to be seductively disturbing. And some of the problems in finding a distributor for the Lyne film speak directly to the different impact of novels and movies.

It is one thing to read Humbert's memoir and hear him describe Lolita as a coquette, and to write of their first sexual encounter, "I am going to tell you something very strange: it was she who seduced me." How much is he embellishing in his imaginative tale?

It is quite different to see Swain roll over in bed and kiss Irons passionately, to whisper in his ear, to act seductive. Putting the action in front of a viewer makes it real, even though we are still confined to Humbert's skewed perspective.

Yet if the relationship acquires physical life on screen, that is also what makes the film powerfully upsetting. In its most distressing scene, Lolita sits on Humbert's lap reading the comics; the camera moves in on her face, which gradually registers an unmistakable orgasmic expression. It is a stomach-churning moment because she has so clearly, as Humbert later realizes, had her innocence stolen from her.

"Lolita" asks its audience to confront and share the darkest emotions. But with its uncompromising vision and its big budget, the film priced itself out of its market from the start. Pathe's initial asking price for the film's American distribution was around $25 million – necessary considering what the film had cost, yet insane considering its limited art-house audience.

The price fell fast, but probably not far enough fast enough, and the film quickly came to seem like damaged goods. "They set their sights too high financially at first," Lyne said.

People on both sides agree that in the later stages money was not the issue. But by then, even distributors who could have picked up the film for Hollywood pocket change (maybe as little as a million dollars) ran away from it. "No one thought it would generate income," as one distributor put it, or at least not enough to make it worth the battle.

Even Lyne now acknowledges the film's limited audience. "It's not necessarily a movie that should be in 2,000 theaters or even 1,000," he said. But he would like it to be seen on a screen.

About the possibility that it may go directly to Showtime, he said: "It would be a bitter pill if it went straight to television. I've got nothing against Showtime, but I didn't make it for television. If it were for television, I would have made it in 30 days."

But he also says he's getting philosophical. "Maybe this is a movie people will come around to," he said.

In fact, I saw "Lolita" a second time more recently, at a screening arranged in New York for this article. And it works even better when you're able to sink into its time and place and character, after the rumors that swirl around it during the first viewing – Why can't it be shown here? Is it as bad as they say? – have been cleared away. Of course, taking the long view doesn't help the aging "Lolita" now.

Brazil has passed a tax shelter law, allowing people to invest in feature film production as an alternative to paying taxes. This move revived the film industry and allowed Barreto to finance "Four Days." But lately things do not look good for the film industry.

"After what happened in Asia with the collapse of the stock market, Brazil is very fearful that this same thing can happen to their economy so they're slashing subsidies," Barreto explains. "And the tax shelter is a subsidy, because the government is saying, 'Okay you don't have to pay me. You can invest.' So the law got slashed 30 percent. They cut percent."

He continues, "And now there is a big motion in Congress to actually end the law. If the law ends, the tax shelter law, feature film production is going to stop again. So the nomination already helps a lot but if the film wins the Oscar that will be validation for the Brazilian film industry."

And if the film wins?

"If the film wins an Oscar that's sort of the biggest validation possible that a film industry could have," Barreto says. "It says, 'Look, we're being recognized abroad by the biggest award in the world.' And that could save the law."

FILM: Academy Award-nominated film "Four Days In September" is currently playing at the Samuel Goldwyn Pavilion Cinemas in Westside Pavilion.

ences. Warner Bros. is discussing a project with Patricia Manterola, a top Mexican actress.

But some studio and company officials pointed out that Hollywood had not been especially quick to respond to Latino audiences. There are few Latino studio executives and agents and only a handful of directors, like Edward James Olmos and Robert Rodriguez.

In recent years there have been only a few films aimed at Latino audiences, among the most notable "Stand and Deliver" (1987), about a tough East Los Angeles teacher who inspires his barrio students; "My Family/Mi Familia" (1995), Gregory Nava's multigenerational tale about a Mexican-American family immigrating to Los Angeles, and "American Me" (1992), Olmos' look at Mexican organized crime.

"We're just slow on the uptake in Hollywood," said Mike De Luca, president for production at New Line Cinema. "Hollywood is such a huge machine that it takes time for people to catch up with what's happening. It'll catch on."

He continues, "And now there is a big motion in Congress to actually end the law. If the law ends, the tax shelter law, feature film production is going to stop again. So the nomination already helps a lot but if the film wins the Oscar that will be validation for the Brazilian film industry."

And if the film wins?

"If the film wins an Oscar that's sort of the biggest validation possible that a film industry could have," Barreto says. "It says, 'Look, we're being recognized abroad by the biggest award in the world.' And that could save the law."

FILM: Academy Award-nominated film "Four Days In September" is currently playing at the Samuel Goldwyn Pavilion Cinemas in Westside Pavilion.

ences. Warner Bros. is discussing a project with Patricia Manterola, a top Mexican actress.

But some studio and company officials pointed out that Hollywood had not been especially quick to respond to Latino audiences. There are few Latino studio executives and agents and only a handful of directors, like Edward James Olmos and Robert Rodriguez.

In recent years there have been only a few films aimed at Latino audiences, among the most notable "Stand and Deliver" (1987), about a tough East Los Angeles teacher who inspires his barrio students; "My Family/Mi Familia" (1995), Gregory Nava's multigenerational tale about a Mexican-American family immigrating to Los Angeles, and "American Me" (1992), Olmos' look at Mexican organized crime.

"We're just slow on the uptake in Hollywood," said Mike De Luca, president for production at New Line Cinema. "Hollywood is such a huge machine that it takes time for people to catch up with what's happening. It'll catch on."

BATSHEVA

ence. And to have a dialogue, you need someone who listens, who sees, one with imagination, who is alert. It is not a matter of understanding dance," Naharin says.

Approaching its 35th year, Batsheva originated as a modern dance company in Tel Aviv. The dance troupe has taken center stage in many countries such as Brazil, Japan and areas throughout Europe.

Although touring can be hectic, the group thrives on displaying their dancing in new countries and keeps from making any cultural comparisons.

"Audience is increasing tremendously in the last years in Israel, I think, in a way due to Batsheva,"

Ben-Ami Einav
General manager of Batsheva

"Home is home and other countries are just places we visit," Naharin explains.

They continue to inspire others, as well. With the Batsheva Ensemble – an extension of the main company – a team of fresh faces can hone their craft as dancers or choreographers while encouraging young people throughout Israel to nourish the passion they have for dance.

"The ensemble has three main points: preparing dancers for mature companies, giving artistic instruments to young choreographers to work with dancers, bringing the dance to young audiences all over Israel with the young company," says Ben-Ami Einav, Batsheva's general manager.

Although unsure about its long-term prospects, Einav asserts the dance ensemble –along with the main company – has played an influential role in influencing the trends of Israel.

"Creating ... was always part of myself. I tested myself with writing, music, sculpture, making up stories."

Ohad Naharin
Choreographer

"When I go to a dance performance, I feel old. The dance audience is increasing tremendously in the last years in Israel, I think, in a way due to Batsheva," Einav says.

No matter what, Naharin plans to make the most of his tenure with the troupe, which has come to feel like a close-knit family. More than anything, Naharin wants to show the results of his research into the rhythm and coordination of our bodies.

"I can only give people my work. I cannot give them the eyes to see it. So, I hope they have good eyes," Naharin jokes.

DANCE: Batsheva Dance Company performs March 13 and 14 at 8 p.m. and March 15 at 2 p.m. at the Veterans Wadsworth Theater. A CenterStage Lecture with the choreographer will take place one hour prior to show times. Tickets are $35, $32 and $9 with UCLA I.D. For more information, call (310) 825-2101.

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make your ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

The ASUCLA Communications Board/Daily supports the University of California's policy on nondiscrimination. No medium shall accept advertisements which present persons of any origin, race, sex, or sexual orientation in a demeaning way or imply that they are limited to positions, capabilities, roles, or status in society. Neither the Daily Bruin nor the ASUCLA Communications Board has investigated any of the services advertised or the advertisements represented in this issue. Any person believing that an advertisement in this issue violated the Board's policy on nondiscrimination should report it to the Business Manager, Daily Bruin, 118 Kerckhoff Hall, 308 Westwood Plaza, Los Angeles, CA 90024. For assistance with housing discrimination problems, call the UCLA Housing Office at (310) 825-4271 or call the Westside Fair Housing Office at (310) 475-9671. Freightliner Corporation is the North American market leader in the design, development and manufacture of a complete line of technologically-advanced heavy and medium-duty trucks and specialty vehicles. We have the following opportunities available:

Sales Applications Engineers

If you are a recent college graduate or in the last year of your mechanical or manufacturing degree program, you may be eligible for our training program for Sales Applications Engineers at our Portland, Oregon Headquarters. In this program, we will teach you how to assist and consult with customers, dealers, and field staff on specific applications and models. You will also inspect designated TSO's for engineering feasibility and provide technical feedback to field sales staff. We are looking for energetic, outgoing individuals who excel at customer service and have a talent for problem solving and troubleshooting. We will also be interviewing students, with at least junior standing, for our summer internships in our Sales Application Engineering Department.

We will be on the UCLA campus Friday, March 13th, at the Engineering Placement office from 9:15am-5:00pm. Stop by and see us. You can also fax your resume in advance to: (503) 735-5299. In addition to an excellent work environment, Freightliner offers a competitive compensation and benefits package. We are an equal opportunity employer. M/F/D/V.

Good Head!

See Dick.
See Dick's cap.
Recent studies show MOST UCLA students drink no more than 4 when they party. So what? Students who drink 4 or less have better love lives, are happier with their relationships, and have "Good Heads". Good thinkin' Dick!

Meet Dick. No he's not on the swim team, and that's not a dunce cap. Actually Dick is a 4.0 student with a good head on his shoulders. Even though Dick has been engaged in some social hijinxs, a couple of beers, a shot and a blow job, he has not lost his head and forgotten his priorities. And if you can't tell by this photo, this particular headgear is quite a head shrinker. O.K. so he never quite learned what bons is connected to what, but he deserves an "A" for effort. After all he's head over heels for the head cheerleader, his headphones are blown and he's trying to head off the headmaster (who incidentally got a good head start). The pressures of this head strong young man have not caused him to charge head first into a heady drink-a-thon. No, not this Dick. He knows over doing it would only cause him a huge headache and a trip straight to the head for a wrestling match with the toilet. (And nobody likes to be in a toilet's headlock) Why if he were to head up a real booze fest, his new head quarters might just be located a six foot under a head stonal Hoods up! Most UCLA students drink four or less when they party. Some don't drink at all. So use your head and remember, when you've done it you're done.

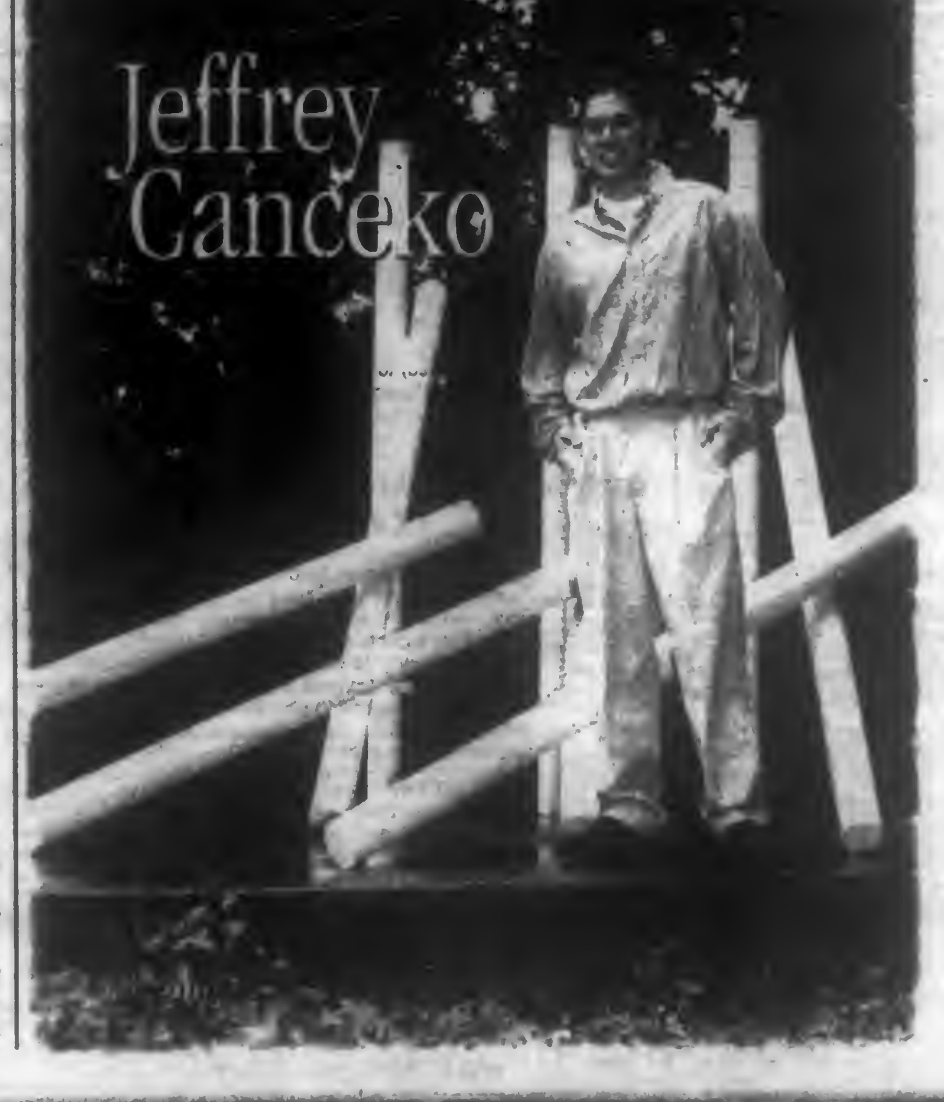
Daily Bruin

Congratulations to Our 15 Senior Spotlights!

Bruinlife Yearbook would like to congratulate the 15 winners of the Senior Spotlight Award.

We would also like to thank all who expressed interest and took the time to apply.

Good luck and continued success in your future endeavors.



The Senior Spotlight Award was developed to recognize distinguished UCLA seniors. These talented students are chosen from a large number of senior applicants, each of which has excelled in many areas during their career at UCLA. Each year these "spotlighted" graduates receive a special page in their honor in the senior section of the Bruinlife Yearbook. This special recognition of outstanding seniors is unique to Bruinlife and is only one of the many interesting ways UCLA and its students are captured in the yearbook.

Today, Bruinlife would like to recognize Jeffrey Canceko for his outstanding achievements. Read about him, along with these fourteen other Senior Spotlights, only in this year's Bruinlife Yearbook:

bench more in the early going. I know he doesn't exactly have Kobe Bryant waiting in the wings, but his starters need a rest now and then. As we saw last Saturday, 38 minutes of sublime play doesn't mean a thing if the team is too exhausted to keep up over the last two. This should be easy enough against the likes of Miami, but the Bruins will need to consistently sub early if they want to hang around.

Now, pirouette and step, step, step.

The second move also involves a bench player: Travis Reed, this is your solo.

In the Bruin's probable second-round matchup against Michigan, somebody will to have to put a body on the Wolverines' extremely wide load in the middle, 300-pound Robert 'Tractor' Traylor. If JR tries, he'll likely spend most of the afternoon watching from the bench. So, it's up to Trav. Now, Chad Overhauser probably would have been better, but hey, you take what you can get.

Baron (Davis) has promised not to foul out during the tournament, but I wouldn't hold my breath.

Lavin needs to put the young guy in early and and give him some simple instructions: if the fat boy gets the ball inside on you, bear hug him. Call it "Hack-a-Track," if you want, but Traylor must be contained or the game will quickly get out of reach.

Leap and plié. Leap and plié.

Finally, Baron Davis must still be in the game at the end. That is not as easy as it sounds: Baron has fouled out of nine of the last 20 games, including three of the last six. And he was saddled with four fouls in another five games during that stretch.

Baron has promised not to foul out during the tournament, but I wouldn't hold my breath unless he and Lavin can somehow figure out a way to control his game without dampening its explosiveness.

Now, for the finale, a couple of other tournament predictions:

Final Four: Duke, Kansas, Arizona and Princeton. Yeah, I said Princeton; you got a problem with that?

Princeton almost took Carolina early this season at the Dean Dome. Now, the two would meet on a neutral sight. Say all you want about how the Tigers' back door offense won't fool anyone anymore; it was never meant to. Princeton relies on execution, not trickery, and they always have. Don't believe me, ask Jim Harrick.

That being said, North Carolina is also my favorite to win the national championship (it's called hedging your bets, people). Should they get by Princeton, the Tar Heels have the goods to take it. Otherwise, its the (ugh!) Jayhawks.

Belle of the ball: St. John's. Felipe Lopez (remember him) finally makes good after three seasons of being college basketball's biggest disappointment.

Purdue, perennial tourney chokers that they are, should present no problem, and Clemson/Stanford won't be enough either.

Ugly girl that should have stayed home: South Carolina. They'll be lucky to make it past Xavier, and a Richmond upset isn't out of the question. Call it a hunch.

started school and complained of the childish nickname, Didrikson said. They then switched to calling her by her birth name, Millie.

Oh, another figment of Babe's imagination there. Sorry about that.

Babe's brothers claim the Norwegian nickname "Baden," "babe" or "baby" in English, stuck, and that's how she ended up with that nickname for the rest of her life.

So now that you are all confused, it's time to make your heads spin faster as we go through an account of Babe's athletic accomplishments.

Babe has a natural gift for sports that can be genetically traced back to her graceful mother, an amateur athlete while growing up in Norway.

Babe put her innate talents to use by practicing all sports imaginable. Babe and her siblings played on a gymnasium constructed by their father in the backyard.

They would then move onto neighborhood games, for which Babe was always the first pick – baseball, jumping, marbles, you name it.

Didrikson honed her athletic skills during school, beating all the boys at their own games, while the other girls played games that did not interest her. Babe was a tomboy to the extreme.

At 19 (if you go by the 1911 birthdate), she left home to play in a semi-professional basketball league sponsored by local insurance companies to promote efficiency and reliability among their employees. Her poor family needed money, so she used her skills to bring home the bacon. Babe was a typist by day, a touring athlete by night.

Didrikson claimed to have hit "something like 13 home runs in one doubleheader," demonstrating "Mighty Mildred's" cocky attitude as well as her fabled power, both of which carried her into the Amateur Athletic Union's (AAU) national championships in 1932, and then the Olympics.

Didrikson's boss and coach, Melvin McCombs, signed her up as a one-woman, track-and-field team for eight events in the AAU competition. She promptly won the championship.

It was off to Los Angeles after that sweep, where she would compete in three summer Olympic events – javelin, hurdles, and high jump. She was the "undisputed star of the women's games," according to Cayleff, setting new Olympic and world records in the javelin throw and 80-meter hurdles.

Babe's gold in the hurdles was tarnished by the close race between herself and a teammate, who claimed to have won the race but was denied the gold medal because of favoritism and publicity.

The high jump was also a controversial event for Babe. She and another teammate tied in that event, but Babe's headfirst dive over the bar was declared illegal, so the teammate won the gold, and Babe had to settle for second place. Because of the controversy, Babe's medal was the only medal in Olympic history to be half gold and half silver.

Didrikson earned money for her struggling family thus by traveling with vaudeville acts and all-male sports teams, such as the House of David baseball players. There was no professional outlet for women's athletes at the time.

Babe eventually took up golf, bringing a power to the sport that had never been seen before in a woman's body. The AAU disqualified her from amateur competition in 1935, citing her earlier efforts to earn money as against the Union's rules. While struggling financially and legally, Babe married the wealthy former boxer George Zaharias, with whom she was teamed for the Los Angeles Open in January 1938. The "Crying Greek from Cripple Creek" supported her financially while she regained amateur status.

> Didrikson Zaharias collaborated with five other golfers to create the Ladies Professional Golf Association (LPGA).

Once she got it back, she won 14 consecutive amateur golf titles, including the British Women's Open of 1947, making her the first American to garner the prestigious title and propelling her to go pro.

One year after winning the British Open, Didrikson Zaharias collaborated with five other golfers to create the Ladies Professional Golf Association (LPGA).

And then cancer struck its heavy hand in 1953, cutting years off of Babe's athletic career. Didrickson won her third U.S. Women's Open 15 months after undergoing a colostomy for cancer of the rectum.

After a second bout with cancer, Babe Didrikson Zaharias died in September 1956.

In 45 years, Babe accomplished so many goals and helped advance women in the world of sports. May her life no longer be a mystery to sports fans, historians, feminists and society in general.

Susan E. Cayleff's "Babe" and Jill Ker Conway's "Written By Herself" were consulted in the writing of this article. Wilcox's next women's sports history feature will be on women and baseball.

players, including his son and Craig Griffey, the son of former teammate Ken Griffey. "I want to help save baseball in Cincinnati. It doesn't matter who you're talking to ... just speak the truth and tell it the way it is."

It was not clear if a Reds employee asked Rose to give the talk. Rose talked at length beforehand with Donnie Scott, the Reds' minor league coordinator, and shook hands with Scott immediately afterward.

Wearing a white pullover shirt and jeans, and leaning on a bat, Rose often used profanity-filled humor to implore players to work harder than those in other organizations, urging them to, "Win and get the Cincinnati Reds back on the map."

"Always expect to win," he said during the talk, which followed an hour-long session with reporters. "Don't be like the Cubs. You know what God told the Cubs, don't you? 'Don't do anything until I get back.'"

He also reminded the young players, who sat mostly in rapt attention, that "the girls like the .300 hitters, the 20-game winners," and that playing baseball "beats working for a living" because a lifetime of wealth can be earned in one season.

"A young guy has a good year now, he gets a $4 million raise. My first year I got a $5,000 raise, and I thought I was stealing," he said. "I'm getting paid to play baseball!"

He also offered this advice to humor Reds owner Marge Schott and her ever-present Saint Bernard: "If you get a chance to pet the dog, pet the dog!"

His son, who was recalled briefly by the Reds late last season, said he never tires of hearing his father talk about baseball.

"I've heard it all before, but it's still fantastic," he said.

Until giving the talk, Rose had been persona non grata in organized baseball, his contact with the sport limited to watching his son play or talking at fantasy camps.

During his investigation of Rose, baseball investigator John Dowd concluded Rose bet $2,000 per game on the Reds to win from 1985-87 while he was their manager.

In April 1990, Rose pleaded guilty to two counts of filing false income taxes returns by failing to report $354,968 in income from autograph appearances, memorabilia sales and gambling. He repaid the IRS $366,041 in back taxes, interest and penalties, and served five months at a federal prison in Marion, Ill. Rose then spent three months in a halfway house and performed 1,000 hours of community service.

Shortly before Rose wrapped up his talk, he gave this advice to the Reds farmhands:

"Pay your ... taxes, by the way, and don't bet on 'Monday Night Football,' either," Rose said.

Attention: Students and Faculty in Humanities Courses!

Did you or one of your students write a terrific paper in a humanities course during spring or fall quarters of 1997 or this winter quarter? If so, please plan to submit the paper for

The Teague-Melville-Elliott and Peter Rotter Essay Prizes

recognizing superior achievement in undergraduate research scholarship in the Humanities.

Eligibility

The competition is open to ALL UCLA undergraduates who were/are enrolled in an undergraduate humanities course during either Spring Quarter 1997, Fall Quarter 1997, or Winter Quarter 1998. The submitted paper must have been written as a course assignment and must be nominated by the instructor of record, with a cover letter from the sponsoring professor highlighting the strengths of the paper. (No other application form is necessary.)

Awards

The Teague-Melville-Eliott Prize winner will receive $1065.
The Peter Rotter Essay Prize winners receive $1,000 and $500 each.

Deadline for submission of faculty nominations: Friday, March 20, 1998. But papers can be submitted at any time this quarter between now and then to 271 Kinsey Hall.

For more information, contact your departmental advisor, or you may direct questions to Dr. Janette Lewis, 825-6172 or lewis@humnet.ucla.edu.

Maryland.

The Terrapins start 6-foot-10-inch Obinna Ekezie at center, and 6-foot-8-inch Rodney Elliott and 6-foot-5-inch Laron Profit at forward. They bring 7-foot Mike Mardesich and 6-foot-8-inch Terence Morris, both freshmen, off the bench.

Utah State has 6-foot-6-inch Donnie Johnson at center, and 6-foot-5-inch Pharoah Davis and 6-foot-3-inch Kevin Rice at forwards.

But the Aggies, who often use a three-guard offense and even started one game this season with four guards and a 6-foot-4-inch center, are used to being shorter than opponents.

"We've been undersized all year. We're not too worried about our height," Rice said.

Eustachy points out his team outrebounded a much taller Pacific squad by 38-28 in the Big West tourney final.

"I think college basketball is about guard play. We won't be intimidated by their size," he said. "But the experience (of the NCAA tournament) is new, and that's what I'm a little worried about."

Maryland coach Gary Williams, who coached an undersized American University team from 1978-1982, said the keys to playing a taller squad are team defense, boxing out on rebounds and taking offensive fouls.

Williams said Utah State is used to a height disadvantage, so won't have to make major adjustments against the Terrapins.

"They've done this so much, they don't have to go out and learn how to play against a taller team," he said. "They won't allow us to play volleyball on the glass."

get my chances. I've always gotten the ball in the seventh or eighth inning, when the game's on the line. People make a big deal about it being tough to pitch the ninth inning. That's baloney. Either way, I'm going to pitch at the end of the game, whether I shake the catcher's hand (earn a save) or not."

Radinsky was 5-1 with a 2.89 ERA and three saves last season. Osuna spent the first month of the year in the minor leagues, then was recalled and wound up 3-4 with a 2.19 ERA and no saves.

General manager Fred Claire acknowledged Osuna has been groomed for the closer's role.

"I think we'll be fine there," Claire said. "For us to be a successful team, one of these two or someone else has to emerge. The vacancy sign is up."

Osuna thinks his time has come. "I'm ready to be the closer, I can do it this year," he said. "I like to feel that emotion of finishing a game. Last year was good for me, I got more experience. I want to be the closer for a long time here ... I'm ready to do it."

Jazz 110, Kings 95

Karl Malone scored 25 points and John Stockton added 16, reaching 15,000 for his career, as the Utah Jazz defeated the Sacramento Kings for the first time in three tries this season, 110-95 Wednesday night.

Malone scored 12 of his points in the first 7:10 and another 11 in the third quarter when the Jazz outscored the Kings 33-24 to pull away for their eighth straight win and 15th in 16 games.

Stockton hit a 3-pointer with 7:19 left in the third quarter to give him 15,001 points for his 14-year career.

Minnesota 113, Warriors 84

Kevin Garnett scored 22 points in three quarters and the Minnesota Timberwolves, after opening a 17-point first quarter lead, ran past the Golden State Warriors 113-84 Wednesday night.

The Timberwolves averaged a 17-point margin of victory in sweeping the four-game season series from the Warriors, who have lost seven straight to Minnesota.

Garnett toyed with the Warriors, making 11 of 17 shots and grabbing nine rebounds before sitting out most of the fourth quarter after Minnesota led 88-62 after three.

Stephon Marbury added 14 points and 10 assists.

Donyell Marshall scored 17 points to lead the Warriors, who shot just 36 percent (32-for-89) to Minnesota's 53.2 (50-for-94).

Lakers 121, Portland 107

Shaquille O'Neal scored 33 points, Rick Fox added 20 and the Los Angeles Lakers tied a season-high by making 40 free throws in a 121-107 victory over the Portland Trail Blazers on Wednesday night.

It was the fourth straight victory for Los Angeles, whose coach, Del Harris, gained his 200th regular-season win as Lakers coach. Harris joined Pat Riley, Fred Schaus and Bill Sharman as the only coaches to reach that figure since the franchise moved from Minneapolis in 1960.

Maple Leafs 3, Ducks 1

Mats Sundin and Derek King scored 1:21 apart early in the second period Wednesday as the Toronto Maple Leafs beat Anaheim 3-1 to send the Mighty Ducks to their sixth straight defeat.

Sundin added an empty net goal with six seconds remaining as Toronto improved to 3-4-1 since the Olympic break. Felix Potvin stopped 27 Ducks shots.

Rangers 5, Sharks 3

While the New York Rangers have slipped toward the bottom of the Eastern Conference standings, their power play has remained potent.

Wayne Gretzky quarterbacked the Rangers offense, scoring a goal and setting up two others Wednesday to key a 5-3 victory over the San Jose Sharks. Three goals came with a manpower advantage in the second period, including two with 27 seconds to turn around the game.

"We've worked a lot on the power play the last five or six games," said Gretzky. "We might have struggled in the beginning of the year, but over the long haul we have one of the top four or five power plays."

Rose violates ban agreement with speech to minor leaguers

BASEBALL: Suspension unlikely to be reconsidered soon; Reds may be fined due to infraction

By Alan Robinson
The Associated Press

SARASOTA, Fla.– Pete Rose always liked nothing better than talking about hitting. His one-hour talk Wednesday to some attentive Cincinnati minor leaguers, however, may have hurt his bid to reverse his lifetime ban.

Rose, standing on a practice field about 50 yards from a batting cage recently named after him, gave an impromptu motivational speech to nearly 100 minor leaguers, including son Pete Jr., an infielder with the Reds' Indianapolis farm club.

Baseball said the talk violated the lifetime ban Rose agreed to nearly nine years ago.

"Pete Rose was in clear violation of the agreement," said Rich Levin, the spokesman for acting commissioner Bud Selig. "We are waiting for a complete written report from the Reds, at which time we will take appropriate action."

The Reds may be fined as a result of Rose's speech, a baseball official said, speaking on condition that he not be identified.

Rose, who agreed to accept the ban following baseball's investigation of his gambling, applied for reinstatement Sept. 26. Selig and the ruling executive council haven't discussed his bid, and Selig, according to several officials, isn't inclined to allow Rose back in the game.

Wednesday's speech may turn into another strike against Rose, the baseball official said.

Rose had received permission from the team to watch his son work out, but there was no prior indication he would make a speech. Rose is welcome at ballparks but can have access only to areas fans are allowed in. Reds President John Allen had said Rose would receive "no special treatment above and beyond Joe Fan."

Baseball's career hits leader said it was the first time he had stood before a professional team since he resigned as the Reds manager at the conclusion of his gambling probe in 1989.

Rose, a 17-time All-Star and the National League's MVP in 1973, agreed to the lifetime ban on Aug. 23, 1989. The ban also has excluded Rose from the Hall of Fame because players under suspension cannot be listed on the ballot.

"I'm not here to cause any trouble," Rose said after receiving a loud ovation from the

For Utah State, size does not matter

NCAA: Team undaunted, set to win despite height advantage of Maryland

By Rob Gloster
The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO – Utah State coach Larry Eustachy watched the NCAA tournament pairings unfold, harboring a secret desire – that his undersized Aggies would draw a short team in the first round.

His wish was not granted.

Instead, Utah State (25-7) will make its first NCAA appearance in a decade against a Maryland (19-10) team whose center and forwards will sport an average 3-inch height advantage over the Aggies.

The Utah State-Maryland game will be the opener Thursday in the West Regional at ARCO Arena.

Other first-round games are Illinois (22-9) vs. South Alabama (21-6), Tennessee (20-8) vs. Illinois State (24-5) and defending champion Arizona (27-4) vs. Nicholls State (19-9).

Arizona is making its 14th consecutive NCAA appearance, second only to North Carolina's 24 straight. The Wildcats won 20 of their last 21 games this season, losing only at Southern California last weekend.

South Alabama, which ranks second nationally in scoring defense by allowing just 54 points a game, nearly upset Arizona in the first round of the NCAA tournament last year.

The Utah State-Maryland game matches two teams that have struggled in their most recent NCAA appearances. Utah State has lost its last seven tournament games, and has not won an NCAA game since 1970.

Maryland has been upset in the first round the past two tournaments, losing to College of Charleston last year and to Santa Clara the previous year. "Right now we're just concentrating on getting through the first round," said Maryland guard Sarunas Jasikevicius.

Two hours after surviving a 32-point performance by Pacific's 7-foot center Michael Olowokandi to win the Big West tournament and an automatic NCAA bid last Sunday, Utah State found out it would face

Dodgers still deciding on permanent closer

MLB: Osuna, Radinsky vie for coveted spot but may end up sharing role

By John Nadel
The Associated Press

VERO BEACH, Fla.– Todd Worrell is gone and already forgotten. The Los Angeles Dodgers will have a new closer this year. Actually, that could be closers.

Worrell's retirement following last season left the Dodgers in need of a short reliever, and they decided to promote from within rather than bring in somebody new.

With opening day three weeks away, the Dodgers still think that decision was the right one, although they haven't decided on one person to do the job.

It could be Antonio Osuna, a 24-year-old right-hander with four career saves, or Scott Radinsky, a 30-year-old left-hander who has 36 lifetime saves. Or both of them.

"Ideally, one will emerge," Dodgers manager Bill Russell said. "We'll see how it goes. Maybe at the start of the season, there won't be an established closer. If not, we'll use them both. It's unresolved. It is a question mark, but I don't consider it a weakness at all. You've got to total up a lot of saves. I'm optimistic we'll do that."

For the most part, Worrell was the team's closer the last five years. He had a club-record 44 saves in 1996 and 35 last year, but was often ineffective during the last half of the season. He finished 2-6 with a 5.28 ERA and nine blown saves, and the Dodgers suffered because of his ineffectiveness.

Osuna and Radinsky both admit they want the closer's job. As a right-hander, Osuna probably has an advantage – outside of Randy Myers, Dave Righetti and John Franco, very few left-handers have been used in that role.

"I think any reliever would be lying to you if he said he didn't want to get saves," Radinsky said. "I don't want to make an issue out of it. I'm going to

WOMEN: Stories, myths shroud amazing athlete in mystery, wonderment

By Kristina Wilcox
Daily Bruin Staff

What a mysterious woman.

Mildred Ella Didriksen was born to Norwegian immigrant parents in Texas sometime during the early 1910s. "Babe," as she was later known as, liked to tinker a bit with her age. Popular legend places her birthday in 1914, but Didriksen's biographer, Susan E. Cayleff, argues that she was actually born in June of 1911, regardless of the historical markers, applications and autobiographies that would suggest otherwise.

Also, an error on school records went unrectified in terms of the spelling of her family's last name. "I didn't want people to think I was a Swede," she once said, so she went on as Didrikson forever after.

With those little stories in mind, we can think of Didrikson as a lightheart-ed individual. But underneath that exterior personality stood an intensely competitive woman who happened to be an excellent athlete, a jill-of-all-trades.

Didrikson earned her nickname when she began demonstrating her power in ballgames. Babe Ruth was everyone's idol during her childhood, so that's what her buddies called her.

Actually, that's another bit of twist-ed truth that Babe would have you believe.

Here's another explanation for her Ruthian name.

As the youngest daughter of seven children, Babe's older siblings and parents had a special affection for her, even after her younger brother was born. She was called "Baby" until she

Bench players get shot against Japan

BASEBALL: Exhibition gives inexperienced chance to test talents

By Kristina Wilcox
Daily Bruin Staff

The UCLA baseball team that took the field on Wednesday night had a very different look, and they faced a very different opponent as well.

The Bruins hosted Hosei University of Japan in an exhibition game at Jackie Robinson Stadium. UCLA head coach Gary Adams opted to exhibit his second- and third-stringers, while the Japanese squad demonstrated first-rate talent in embarrassing the Bruins, 12-4.

"They surprised me," UCLA designated hitter Bill Scott said. "They were good. I enjoyed playing them. It was a lot of fun."

The contest almost did not happen, too.

"It was for good relations," Adams said. "The game was scheduled for so late in the year, so I almost wasn't going to go through with it."

It is a good thing that the two teams did play because non-starters had the chance to get some playing time, and they were able to learn more about the team's strengths and weaknesses.

The bench player who shined for the Bruins on Wednesday night was Scott, who went 2-for-4. His eighth-inning single to left field broke up Eiji Yano's masterful no-hitter.

"It felt good to get that hit," Scott said. "It was totally my aim to breakup the no-hitter. All I wanted to do was break it up. I really wanted to hit a homer in that at-bat."

In the ninth, Scott did launch his homer, a three-run shot to left that scored third baseman Aldo Pinto and shortstop Nick Lyon, both of whom got on base courtesy of walks.

"That ball was kissed, no doubt about that," Adams said about Scott's homer. "It worked out well," Scott said. "The next time I wanted to do it, and I did."

JAMIE SCARLON-JACOBS/Daily Bruin

Nick Lyon makes a throw to first as a Hosei University player attempts to make it to third.

After witnessing the lopsided game, Adams made sure to point out that Hosei's team is older than the one fielded by UCLA.

"They are all older than us, mostly 22-year-olds," Adams said. "In the dugout (pitching coach Tim) Leary pointed out that they don't have any teenagers on their team, like we do."

That is also true of the UCLA squad as a whole. The starters were given the day off for "purely academic" reasons, according to Adams.

"We've traveled so much, and we are on the road this weekend," Adams said.

"We even had study hall for the freshman who did not play tonight."

Besides using bench players in the game, UCLA also used aluminum bats, while Hosei prefers wooden ones. "I think the bats gave them a disadvantage," Scott said.

It would be scary to think about all the runs that could have been scored if Hosei did switch to aluminum. Yikes.

Bruins badgered by unranked Wisconsin

M.TENNIS: No. 10 UCLA struggles with sets that should have been easy

By Stephanie Chan
Daily Bruin Contributor

When the No. 10-ranked team plays the unranked team, the No. 10 team should win. The problem was that the No. 10 UCLA men's tennis team knew that too well.

When the Bruins played Wisconsin Wednesday, the intensity belonged to the underdog, but the victory did land in the hands of UCLA, 5-2.

"We came out flat as can be. We looked like guys that thought these guys were gonna roll over," said UCLA head coach Billy Martin.

The Badgers certainly did not roll over as they handed the Bruins losses in the five and six positions and long first sets. Wisconsin's David Chang extended Matt Breen to a 7-6 first set before Breen stopped the serve-and-volleyer 6-2 in the second set.

"A match like this showed that we're not much better than a team like Wisconsin, and if we think we are, we're going to start losing to teams like this," said Breen.

Hindered by an injured elbow and Achilles, Vince Allegre struggled with Wisconsin's John Thomsen in the first set, but took it 7-5. He made the 180-degree turn, though, and bageled the second set, 6-0. At No. 4 Alex Decret pushed past a slow start to defeat Wisconsin's Jeff Malik, 6-4, 6-2.

> "Sometimes ... how you win matters more than the win itself."
> Alex Decret
> Tennis player

"We didn't play at our best level. We still won, but sometimes the fashion and how you win matters more than the win itself," said Decret.

Perhaps the only player to play to his potential was UCLA's No. 1, Jean-Noel Grinda. Grinda beat Wisconsin's Mark Loughrin 6-2, 6-1.

At No. 5, Chris Sands fell to Wisconsin's Stefan Reist, 6-3, 6-2. A similar fate awaited UCLA's No. 6 Noah Newman. Newman was able to extend Wisconsin's Adam Schumacher to three sets, yet Schumacher won 6-3, 4-6, 7-5.

Martin was unhappy with the No. 2 and No. 3 doubles-team play. Though the Bruins claimed the doubles point, their play was not spectacular.

Grinda and Breen solidly defeated Chang and Loughrin, 8-3, but Newman and Decret struggled to beat Thomsen and Malik, 8-6. The No. 3 tandem of Allegre and Sands lost to Reist and Schumacher, 4-8.

"We can't play that way. We're not that good of team to not be ready to play each and every match at our full potential," said Martin.

The potential is there for the Bruins, but it comes down to whose level they play at. Yesterday, it was Wisconsin's level.

UCLA's invite to Big Dance is no indicator of impending win

COLUMN: Don't expect Bruins to be this year's 1997 Arizona Wildcats

Rob Kariakin

Hello, beautiful people, my name is Fabrizio, Fabrizio Bailando of the Krzyzewski Big Dance School. No, silly, we aren't a specialty studio for heavy-set people: We're a place of instruction for that darling little NCAA tournament you all love so much.

I have been asked by that charming Mr. Kariakin to provide UCLA with the basic steps to success before the galla begins this afternoon.

Now, first position, Bruins! First position! And away we go!

To begin with, get the idea out of your heads that the secret lies in following the steps of last year's Arizona team. Ignore the similarities: player suspensions, a dynamic freshman point guard, three losses in the last six games, a non-top three seed in the South Regional. The differences are even more significant.

For one, the Bruins can't sneak up on everybody the way 'Zona did last year. When you have a tradition as storied as UCLA's, not to mention three returning players from a national championship team, teams don't overlook you.

Next, they had/have more inside depth, with AJ Bramlet (6 feet 11 inches), Bennett Davison (6 feet 8 inches), Dommell Harris (6 feet 11 inches) and Eugene Edgerson (just 6 feet 6 inches, but a rebounding fool). UCLA has only JR at 6 feet 8 inches.

Finally, the Bruins' starting shooting guard isn't stupid enough. Miles Simon missed 11 games last season after being declared academically ineligible at the start of last season. Oh, and did I mention that his major is family studies? What did he fail, Diapering 101?

No, no, no. If UCLA wants to go all the way at this year's dance, it's going to have to choreograph its own moves.

Kick, kick. Sashay, sashay.

GENEVIEVE LIANG/Daily Bruin

Kris Johnson and his teammates have endured many ups and downs this season.

All OR nothing

The Bruins have undergone more ups and downs than a roller coaster – will they live up to the best or worst expectations?

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

This year's ever-changing version of Bruin basketball has gone through more ups and downs, more twists and turns and more comings and goings than any team has a right to expect or endure.

In a span of less than six months, these Bruins have seen two key contributors suspended in a shroud of public secrecy, both of whom eventually came back – only to see one take over a crucial role, while the other resigned just 15 games after his return.

They have seen their best-behaved player benched for a game against their cross-town rivals and a potential star recruit forced out of school for academic reasons, and have aimlessly drifted through two of the worst losses in school history.

They have also seen, however, signs of greatness – albeit inconsistent and sporadic ones. They have reflected on the ending of the careers of three Bruin mainstays, yet at the same time seen the emergence of two budding superstars.

They have disappointed plenty, surprised some and perplexed virtually everyone on their way to a lukewarm 22-8 season and a meeting with Miami in the first round of the NCAA Tournament Friday in Atlanta.

"If someone would have said that with all the things that have happened, you'd be 22-8 and in the top 20, I would have said no chance," UCLA head coach Steve Lavin said. "That's what's been so surprising, and it really says a lot about our team in terms of their character and and their ability to persevere."

They are a team that has fallen tremendously short of its lofty preseason expectations. But with all that's transpired, one begins to wonder if the squad under-achieved, over-achieved or neither ... or both.

They are a team that has proven that it can play with the nation's elite when it wants to, yet they have also proven to be very vulnerable.

And they are a team that had such an amorphous roster that its team picture wasn't taken until the eve of the regular-season finale.

"This season was full of ups and downs," senior forward J.R. Henderson said. "It was kind of crazy at the beginning. The season kept going up and down, up and down, up and down, and we never had a chance to define ourselves as a team."

Yet, there have been many defining moments for the Bruins – some incredibly frustrating, others just plain amazing.

It has been a season defined by senior forward Kris Johnson, who, upon taking the blame for the departure of friend and junior center Jelani McCoy, was on the verge of tears in front of a group of reporters after a practice.

It has been a season defined by Baron Davis, who actually came to tears after his errant three-point shot sealed UCLA's 91-87 loss to Arizona last Saturday.

Inspired by its seniors, the women's team has turned around a season that at first appeared headed for disappointment

By Chris Umpierre
Daily Bruin Contributor

It was Dec. 20 and the team had just finished losing a heartbreaker in overtime to No. 5 North Carolina, 78-82. The defeat put them at 2-4 on the season, well below preseason expectations for the talent-laden UCLA women's basketball squad.

But as the team lay slouched with their heads down in the North Carolina locker room after the game, the four seniors on the team stood up.

Tawana Grimes, Carla Houser, Jamie Oenning and Aisha Veasley told their teammates on that fateful day that they were not going to end their last season in blue and gold this way. They were not going to finish the season sitting out yet another tournament as they did their previous three years.

And largely because of the speeches from those four seniors, the UCLA women's basketball team turned its season around.

Since UCLA's loss at North Carolina, the No. 25 Bruins (19-8 overall, 14-4 Pac-10) went 17-4 and captured a third-place finish in the Pac-10 and a tournament bid along the way.

"They came into the locker room after that North Carolina game and the team was mad," UCLA head coach Kathy Olivier said. "They weren't disappointed, they weren't sulky – they were mad. They felt that we should have won that game.

"Everyone in that locker room made a pact that day. 'Let's make that commitment and let's go for it. We are a lot better than we are playing.'"

But it wasn't the coach or the coaching staff that initiated the pact in that North Carolina locker room; it was the four seniors that ripped into the team.

"The seniors just said that they were not going to take this anymore," Olivier said, who, along with her coaching staff, was listening from just outside the locker room door. "They told the team that they (would) have to work harder in practice, work harder in the games and give 100 percent effort."

And pay off it did.

From that game on, one could see a visibly different Bruin team. A Bruin team that dove for loose balls and a Bruin team that left everything on the court after games.

"We started to go into games after North Carolina very focused, which was something we hadn't been doing before," Olivier said. "We are a young team and we would go through lapses where we were not focused, where we get silly fouls – inexperience things. They learned from that point on."

One began to see this much more focused and hardworking team two nights after the North Carolina game, when UCLA took on No. 17 Duke in the Cameron Indoor Arena. The Bruins played inspired ball to capture a 93-83 upset of the Blue Devils, igniting a winning streak that, before the season was over, would make UCLA the hottest team in the land.

After beating No. 17 Duke, UCLA went on to beat highly ranked Washington twice. The Bruins blew out the Huskies 80-59 on the road and 96-72 in Pauley Pavilion.

Their only defeats since North Carolina have been to top-ranked teams. Although UCLA got blown out by No. 6 Stanford 105-80 on Feb. 13, the Bruins played the Cardinal tough at home before succumbing 75-70 on Jan. 18. And the team played No. 10 Arizona tough before eventually losing 84-73 on the road and 82-71 at home.

All told, UCLA won 17 of its last 21 games of the season. The focused UCLA team is as different as night and day from the Bruin team that began the season.

After being ranked No. 25 in the pre-season, the Bruins opened their season with three straight loses. UCLA lost to St. Mary's 63-83, George Washington 73-78 and Notre Dame 91-93 in double overtime.

The squad rebounded with two victories against Fresno State and San Diego before playing North Carolina in Chapel Hill.

Despite the rocky 2-4 start, both the coaches and players always knew that the team had the talent to do much better.

All OR nothing

The Bruins have undergone more ups and downs than a roller coaster – will they live up to the best or worst expectations?

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

This year's ever-changing version of Bruin basketball has gone through more ups and downs, more twists and turns and more comings and goings than any team has a right to expect or endure.

In a span of less than six months, these Bruins have seen two key contributors suspended in a shroud of public secrecy, both of whom eventually came back – only to see one take over a crucial role, while the other resigned just 15 games after his return.

They have seen their best-behaved player benched for a game against their cross-town rivals and a potential star recruit forced out of school for academic reasons, and have aimlessly drifted through two of the worst losses in school history.

They have also seen, however, signs of greatness – albeit inconsistent and sporadic ones. They have reflected on the ending of the careers of three Bruin mainstays, yet at the same time seen the emergence of two budding superstars.

They have disappointed plenty, surprised some and perplexed virtually everyone on their way to a lukewarm 22-8 season and a meeting with Miami in the first round of the NCAA Tournament Friday in Atlanta.

"If someone would have said that with all the things that have happened, you'd be 22-8 and in the top 20, I would have said no chance," UCLA head coach Steve Lavin said. "That's what's been so surprising, and it really says a lot about our team in terms of their character and and their ability to persevere."

They are a team that has fallen tremendously short of its lofty preseason expectations. But with all that's transpired, one begins to wonder if the squad under-achieved, over-achieved or neither ... or both.

SENIORS: Bruin trio has survived through seasons of problems

By Emmanuelle Ejercito
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

UCLA Sports Information

Four years ago, Toby Bailey, J.R. Henderson and Kris Johnson were ready to embark on storied careers. But little did they know that the story would read like a soap opera.

The 1998 NCAA Tournament will be the final chapter for the three seniors who have experienced the highest of the highs and the lowest of the lows.

"At times it seems like it has been longer than four years," Henderson said. "We've been through so many coaches and so many problems, it feels like it has lasted forever."

Well not quite forever, but it has been an eventful four years.

Magical – perhaps that is the only way to describe their freshman year. The Bruins won the Pac-10 and were ranked number one at the end of the regular season.

The dream year culminated with UCLA defeating Arkansas, 89-78, for the national title.

But all the success created an illusion – an illusion that would set them up for disappointment their sophomore year.

"You know it was so easy to get to the finals that year, it just seemed like everything was going our way," Bailey said. "I don't think I realized how difficult it actually is to get to the finals and I didn't realize how perfect that year was."

Said Henderson: "We just felt that that was just how it was at UCLA, you know, we just automatically go to the Final Four every year and win the Pac-10 every year and that's how it was. We just found out that we had great leadership that year – Ed (O'Bannon), Tyus (Edney) and George (Zidek), that's what it took to get there."

And that's what they were missing in the 1995-1996 season as the roster was dominated by juniors, sophomores and freshmen.

UCLA had the talent and the athleticism and were expected to repeat the previous year's successes. But in its first game since the championships, the preseason No. 4 Bruins lost to unranked Santa Clara at the Maui Invitational.

However, despite the rough start to its season, UCLA ended the year as repeat Pac-10 champs, ranked in the top 15 and earned a Midwest fourth seed in the tournament. In the first round, UCLA faced the seemingly innocuous 13th-seed Princeton. But the Tigers would surprise the Bruins and win, 43-41, on a back-door play.

"The fact that we won the championship the first year and to come back and lose in the first round," Henderson said, "It just feels like the lowest you can possibly go."

The next season, UCLA was Remarkable athlete returns from injury to achieve her championship dreams

By David Arnold
Daily Bruin Contributor

Lace up, folks, we're going for a four-year walk in Erica Gomez's shoes. From this point on you are the point guard on the UCLA women's basketball team. You are the student, you are the athlete, you are the Jersey girl in Pauley Pavilion.

And you will eventually understand what it is that could bring a young woman across the country, what could bring her back from a season-ending injury and what brought her to the NCAA Tournament.

One Pac-10 freshman-of-the-year award, one red-shirted year due to a torn anterior collateral ligament (ACL), one family, one starting position, one All-Pac-10 team, one tournament appearance ... the list goes on and on.

If it seems for the next few minutes like you have a little bit of everything, you may not be far from the truth.

In your three years at UCLA you've been through a lot. You've gone from team rookie to team leader, you've gone from the bench to the record books.

"My years have been up and down, like a roller coaster, but I wouldn't change them; it's all been like a learning experience," you say.

You were a highly regarded recruit. In high school you were the leader of a very successful program, played in four state championships and were the MVP in three of them. You were All-State and All-America and a rising star. Your teams had an overall record of 105-15.

Your dad wanted you to go to Stanford – you hated it. You were ready to commit to Wake Forest until he forced you to take a trip to UCLA.

Reporters ask you, "Why UCLA?" You say, "There was nothing that I didn't like about our school."

You took over the starting job just two games into your college career, and immediately tied a school record with 15 assists. That freshman year you had the first triple-double in the conference since 1978, and only the sixth ever recorded. You were the Pac-10 freshman of the year, but your team went 13-14 and missed the tournament.

Reporters asked you if that was a tough transition. "It hurt, but I knew our team was on the rise. We would eventually become a good team," you said, alluding to the adjustment you had to make from being on a top-notch team to an also-ran.

On Oct. 8, 1996 you tore your ACL and had to support your team from the bench.

You're asked if you're coming back. "Of course," you answer. "When you get hurt you question it, and do you really want to come back? Well, if you love the game then you come back."

This game has been your game ever since you decided to dedicate yourself to it in eighth grade, and you loved it enough to come back.

"I think everything happens for a reason," you've been known to say, though you never knew why your knee gave way.

Remember how high the expectations were of the team this year, expectations that the team put on itself? You wanted to be in the top three in the conference, you wanted to make the Big Dance, and when you got there, you wanted to finish up by "doing damage."

Reporters asked you to evaluate your performance this year. You said, "I don't feel like I'm playing 100 percent," and your statistics are down from your freshman year. All of them except the most important one: the win-loss record.

Well, after you guided your team to a 19-8 season, you've got two goals down and one left to go. Tomorrow you attempt to "do damage" to Michigan in the first round of the tournament.

Tomorrow you will take the court in Tuscaloosa, Ala., and for the first time in too long your dad and his parents will be sitting in the stands to support you.

"My dad has been the most positive person in my whole career," you say. "I haven't seen him for a while."

Sometimes he'll watch you on the satellite, other times you'll tape games for him. But not since high school has he been able to be there for every game, making every moment more enjoyable.

It was your dad who started you playing basketball in the first place. "He played it, and I wanted to spend time with him, so I played," you say.

It was a basketball family, then, as your sister Audrey went to USC. "I was kinda next in line," you remember.

JAMIE SCANLON-JACOBS/Daily Bruin

The return of point guard Erica Gomez has been one of the major factors in the Bruins' tournament run.

You also remember how to combine the love of the game with the work of the game. "Sometimes it's not a question of it being fun," you've said, though you always agree that "you have to love it; you can't just be here for the money."

You remember sitting on the bench watching your teammates play. "I knew their games inside and out," you would reflect, noting that "you see things that you wouldn't see if you were playing."

This year, even though you had an injured thumb that became painful when you touched the ball, you continued to play extra minutes. Not because you wanted the time and the statistics. Nothing like that. You said, "I want to get it to the players that don't score. I want to be the one that gives it to them."

"I asked her at one point if she wanted out, and she looked at me like I was crazy. You gotta love that," recalls head coach Kathy Olivier.

Even if it meant staying in the game until the horn blew, you wanted to get every player to score, a feat you accomplished against Washington State.

"We've got to keep Gomez on the floor just to keep the flow going," Olivier says about you,

Former UCLA women's coach Billie Moore talks about the game today and a vision for the future

By Chris Umpierre
Daily Bruin Contributor

John Wooden, the Wizard of Westwood, is well known around the country for his success as a Bruin coach and how he tremendously influenced the game of basketball.

But many fail to remember another legendary and influential basketball coach from UCLA.

Billie Moore coached the UCLA women's basketball program for 16 years from 1978-1993. Moore led her Bruins to 296 victories, ranking high on the list for most wins in women's college basketball history, seven tournament appearances – including five Sweet 16 finishes, and UCLA's one-and-only national championship in women's basketball in 1978.

The Daily Bruin recently talked to Moore about her thoughts.

Around the country UCLA is known for its great men's basketball program, and the one person that is usually associated with it is John Wooden. A lot of people don't really know about Billie Moore and what you did for the UCLA women's program and women's basketball in general. Do you have feel any resentment about that?

It's amazing now how many people in the profession since I have been out of coaching do remember my accomplishments. It has amazed me how many people do know and are much aware of my name, what I have done and know it was at UCLA. But that is not the reason you coach, that's not why you do something like that. You don't do it for that recognition.

Do you feel overshadowed by John Wooden's legacy at UCLA?

No. Obviously I think what Coach Wooden did at UCLA is something that will never be repeated. No men's program has come close to accomplishing that since. They talk about Pat (Summit) possibly coming close to that. She is a great friend of mine at the University of Tennessee and is getting ready to maybe try to win a sixth (national title). But that still pales in comparison. (Wooden) cast a huge, huge shadow. He put UCLA on the map athletically. But I always thought that it was more of a plus. I never thought it was something that overshadowed me.

You not only brought the UCLA women's basketball program to national recognition but the sport of women's basketball as well. You coached the first USA Olympic women's basketball team in 1976. How do you feel about that?

One of the things I have always said is that I've enjoyed the opportunity to be the first Olympic women's basketball coach. I've always told the players that were on that first team that there can always be a lot of other Olympics but there will never be a first. I feel the same way about the UCLA women's basketball program. Hopefully we will win a lot of championships, but I will always be part of the first. I like being a pioneer.

Largely because of the gold medal victory in the 1996 Olympics and the creation of the WNBA, women's basketball is seeing an ever-growing fan base. What do you see in the future of women's basketball?

I just hope that the two pro leagues (the ABL and WNBA) become very solid so that there is that opportunity for both players and coaches. Up until two years ago, if you were a female and wanted to play professionally you had to go to Europe to play. That has changed within two years. I hope these opportunities continue.

I would like to keep seeing the women's game getting the same kind of recognition, the same kind of fan support and media support that it's enjoying now. If it keeps growing I think we are on the right track. So I guess my answer to you is that we don't have to do anything dramatic or drastic. If we stay on track and everything keeps moving forward then women's basketball should be fine.

A lot of people have criticized the women's game as slow and unexciting. Many want to lower the rims to make the women's game more exciting. Do you think they should?

No. I think Coach Wooden made a great quote about that a couple of years ago. He said the only level where basketball is played together as a team, as it is supposed to be played, is in the women's game.

It doesn't take a lot of skill to dunk a basketball. It just takes height and ability to jump. Lowering the rim is not going to make the game more exciting. I think if you watch what's happening now in the game you'll see that it is an up-tempo game. The shooting is improved and the ball handling is improved. So I think the game is fine the way it is and the height of the basket is fine the way it is. You've got some women now that can dunk, so that's not that big an issue anymore.

Do you think women's basketball will ever get as big as the men's game?

You approach it incorrectly when you think that we are competing with the men's game. The women's game is women's basketball. They are excellent basketball players, they are excellent athletes – they just happen to be female. They are not trying to compete with the men, they are not trying to be compared with the men. They are just women who play the game of basketball at a very highly skilled level.

From head to toe, Bruins have superstitions covered

LUCK: With tournament starting Friday the 13th, players take no chances

By Emmanuelle Ejercito
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

The Bruins play their first-round tournament game against Miami on Friday. But it's no ordinary Friday – it's Friday the 13th. And in a tournament where an unlucky bounce of the ball can end a team's season, you'd better believe that the No. 19 UCLA men's basketball team will leave nothing up to chance.

When the Bruins travel to Atlanta, aside from their jerseys and warm-up suits, they will also bring their repertoire of superstitions.

Ever notice how Kris Johnson is always the last to join the mid-court huddle before the game and right before he does, he always makes a lay-up?

"Yeah that's one of my superstitions; I've always done that," Johnson said. "I always make the last basket."

Or how about Rico Hines and the towels on his head?

"Kris did it a lot his freshman year, and they won a national championship," Hines said. "Since I am so superstitious, I figured if I did it we might win another national championship."

But don't look for Hines to have the two towels on – the one on his head and the one around his neck – after he comes off the bench. Hines will only wear the towels at the start of the game and at the start of the second half.

Some of the team's superstitions, though, aren't as easily observed. For example, Hines puts a penny in each of his shoes, a habit he acquired in the eighth grade. Oh, and the pennies have to be heads up.

"The pennies are my go-to, it's my lucky charm," Hines said. "(But) with tails, you are not supposed to mess with it."

And Hines would never consider playing a game without a penny in his shoes.

"(If I didn't have a penny), I don't know," Hines said. "I'd probably break my leg or die or something."

> "I've got a lot of superstitions. But I can't tell you though – it's bad luck."
> Toby Bailey
> Senior guard

After going into an offensive slump after the Feb. 12 Stanford match-up, Toby Bailey has turned things around in the last four conference games. Since the Washington State game, Bailey has been averaging 23.8 points and has made 35 of his 61 shots. While one could attribute the turnaround to a renewed focus, the real answer is on his left arm – the arm band similar to the one he wore last year.

"I didn't wear it my senior year; I just wanted a new start," Bailey said. "But I had to go back, I had to go back. The whole year I haven't had it – the first game was Washington State."

Note to the Beanie Boys: The next time you pass Bailey an arm band, make sure it's white.

"They passed me a blue one (at last year's Duke game) and I played alright, but it wasn't the same," Bailey said. "It has to be white."

Bailey also doesn't wear the same shoes as the team. While the rest of the Bruins wear the Allen Iverson shoes, Bailey doesn't, especially after slipping in the last moments of the three-point Stanford loss to turn the ball over.

Does the senior have any other superstitions?

"Oh yeah, I've got a lot of superstitions," Bailey said. "But I can't tell you though – it's bad luck."

Some players listen to the same song before each game. Earl Watson, who writes high school teammates' names on his shoes and always sits at the back of the bus for good luck, chooses his song at the start of each season and sticks with it for the entire year. Meanwhile, Johnson listens to Mary J. Blige's "I Can Love You."

However, not all superstitions are permanent. During last season's 12-game winning streak at the end of the year, Johnson always wore a pair of Hawaiian boxers.

"I don't have those anymore," Johnson said. "I threw them away when we lost to Minnesota (in the Elite Eight)."

So as long as the Bruins don't open up any umbrellas in the Georgia Dome, avoid black cats and don't walk under any ladders, they should be able to overcome any Friday the 13th influence and beat the Hurricanes ... knock on wood.

Women ready for first tournament run in six years

W. HOOPS: Bruins enter competition with high hopes after strong season

By David Arnold
Daily Bruin Contributor

UCLA senior guard Tawana Grimes has never seen post-season college play due to the Bruins' six year absence from the NCAA Tournament, but she knows what she's talking about.

"At this point, it's not about being satisfied, it's about being ready for the tournament," Grimes said.

Players, coaches and journalists have had five days since the tournament selections came out to discuss the seedings and try to predict who will win it all. Now it's time to play basketball – women's style.

In the first round, UCLA, seeded No. 7, will play No. 10 Michigan in Tuscaloosa, AL. It'll be a battle of teams trying to begin a tradition. It has been six years since the Bruins have been invited to the Big Dance. The last and only appearance by the Wolverines was in 1990. UCLA (19-8, 14-4 Pac-10) and Michigan (19-9, 10-6 Big Ten): This will also be the first time in history that each school play each together.

The Bruins have shown that they have what it takes to compete against highly-ranked national teams. In fact, the only losses (in the Pac 10) that they have suffered came from Stanford and Arizona – who are both Top 10 schools. Earlier in the year, the Bruins almost defeated

MIDWEST

NO. 1 SEED -- Kansas (34-3)

For some reason, the Jayhawks have been lost among all the hoopla surrounding North Carolina, Duke and Arizona. Kansas is definitely one of the top four teams in the nation and has some of the best teamwork of any team in the tourney. The entire starting lineup is comprised of upperclassmen, which should bode well for KU in the later rounds.

DARK HORSE -- Clemson (18-13)

The Tigers took Duke to overtime in the ACC semifinals, and almost beat the Blue Devils another time. In the ACC, Clemson managed a split with every team other than Duke and North Carolina, showing their inconsistency. If they get hot, they can make a run for the Sweet 16 (or farther), but if they continue to struggle from the free throw line, our dark horse could turn into glue.

PAC-10 HOPES -- Stanford (24-4)

While the Cardinal's record is impressive, many of their wins came against teams that weren't – they lost all three games against current top 10 teams. Though Stanford is known for its strength underneath the basket, its outside shooting has saved them on more than one occasion (UCLA knows all about this).

THE DAILY BRUIN SAYS...

This should be referred to as "The Harrick Region," with former UCLA head coach Jim Harrick's Rhode Island Rams facing his former assistant coach Mark Gottfried's Murray State Racers, while 13th-seeded Valparaiso is coached by Jim Harrick Jr. The only element that's missing is UCLA ... Kansas should defeat Purdue in the Elite 8 for a trip to San Antonio.

SOUTH

THE NO. 1 SEED -- Duke (29-3)

The Blue Devils are as deep as the Atlantic Ocean, if not deeper. Even their second team would be a tournament contender. However, despite the talent of their freshmen, they are still just freshmen and have shown moments of inexperience. Duke's lack of size in the post (beyond Elton Brand) has been its Achilles' Heel in its losses to North Carolina (twice) and Michigan.

THE DARK HORSE -- Syracuse (24-8)

The Orangemen know how to make Cinderella runs – they made it to the championship game two years ago as four-seed. They are a five this time, but with a weak New Mexico as the four-seed they have a virtual gift wrap to the regionals. They made a strong showing in last week's Big East Conference tournament and almost handed UConn a loss in the title game.

PAC-10 HOPES -- UCLA (22-8)

If the Bruins to continue to play with the intensity they have shown over the past two and a half games, UCLA could be a surprise emergence from the South. However, the Bruins drew one of the toughest brackets and fatigue may take its toll on their short rotation. While getting past Michigan in the second round will be hard enough, beating Kentucky and Duke in the later rounds would be a Herculean task.

THE DAILY BRUIN SAYS...

Michigan hasn't won a tournament game since 1994, but Davidson should help the Wolverines end their streak. Christian Laettner isn't around anymore, so don't be surprised if Kentucky beats Duke in a regional final to avenge its loss six years ago ... Butler will serve New Mexico with a big upset in the first round.

EAST

THE NO. 1 SEED -- North Carolina (30-3)

Six of its seven top players return from last season's Final Four squad and former assistant Matt Carter, Ed Cota and Shammond Williams have returned to the program to help coach. The Tar Heels don't have much depth, but with an alphabetically ranking starting lineup as talented as theirs, they don't need it. Even without Dean Smith at the helm, they haven't missed a step.

DARK HORSE -- Princeton (26-1)

The Tigers' only loss this year came at the hands of the Tar Heels. If the Tigers can force the slow half-court tempo they can be very dangerous. In the loss to UNC they surrendered only 50 points. They are more talented than past Tiger teams who have made the tourney, but if they can't force the tempo, their lack of height and quickness will spell their doom.

PAC-10 HOPES -- Washington (18-9)

The 11th-seeded Huskies are making their first tournament appearance since 1986. They have the talent and the height (they have two seven-footers in Todd MacCullough and Patrick Femerling), but lack the experience to make a serious run. They could upset Xavier, but it would be a surprise if they could get past South Carolina and into the Sweet 16.

THE DAILY BRUIN SAYS...

The Tar Heels should not only win this region, but they are our pick to win it all ... Watch for 5-foot, 5-inch Earl Boykins and Eastern Michigan to surprise rival Michigan State in the first round ... All the turmoil surrounding Bobby Knight will prove a distraction and send the seventh-seeded Hoosiers home in a first round loss to Oklahoma.

WEST

THE NO. 1 SEED -- Arizona (27-4)

Last year, the Wildcats shocked everybody by making a run through the tournament as a four-seed to win the national title. However, with all five starters returning from that championship squad they won't be able to sneak up on anyone. Led by three national player of the year candidates, they are as talented as anybody in the tourney.

DARK HORSE -- Maryland (19-10)

The Terrapins showed how potent they are when they defeated both North Carolina and Kansas – both of whom are top seeds in the tournament. After a slow start, they won 11 of their final 15 games and finished 10-6 in the extremely tough ACC. They should be ready for the madness of the tournament, as they played the nation's toughest schedule.

PAC-10 HOPES-- Arizona (27-4)

OK, so it's the same team as the No. 1 seed ... they're good enough to write about twice. After running through the conference with a 17-1 mark, they are the conference's best hope of reaching the Final Four. However, the Wildcats have shown inconsistencies as of late – they lost to USC Thursday and nearly lost to UCLA, California, Arizona State and Oregon State.

THE DAILY BRUIN SAYS....

This is by far the weakest region in the bracket ... No. 2 Cincinnati is by far the worst team in its seed in the tourney, and the same could be said for Utah at No. 3 ... Watch out for Arkansas and Temple, because they are always dangerous come tournament time ... Arizona should win this region, but must watch out for Maryland in the Sweet 16.

SECOND EXPOSURE

Bruins script tourney with happy ending at Final Four

ANALYSIS: Taking one step at a time essential to realizing lofty goals

By Brent Boyd
and Emmanuelle Ejercito
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

If Kris Johnson were a screen writer, San Antonio would be the final scene to a Bruin tournament run that would only be believed in Hollywood.

"I think that it is so well-scripted that it's going to be a perfect ending and that we are going to go back to the Final Four," Johnson said. "I really believe it. It's just a matter of us playing basketball and doing it."

But they'd have to be doing it against some pretty tough opponents.

The No. 19 UCLA men's basketball team, ever-so-loved by the NCAA Tournament Committee, drew the hardest bracket in the Big Dance.

If the Bruins (22-8) are to make a trip to the Alamodome, they will have to get by some powerhouse teams such as No. 3 Duke, No. 5 Kentucky and No. 12 Michigan.

"I think it's a strong region, no question about it," UCLA head coach Steve Lavin said.

With the 1996 first-round Princeton loss still lurking in the back of their minds, the Bruins don't want to look at what may lay ahead for them in the South Region.

"We're not even thinking about Michigan right now," said Johnson of a team that UCLA could face in the second round. "Being part of a team that suffered a first-round loss, we're not going to make that mistake again, we're just concerned about Miami and what we have to do to win that ball game and then we'll think about Michigan if they get past Davidson.

"It's tourney-time and crazy things have happened, so we've got to take it one game at a time."

But in order for Johnson's perfect ending to happen, what would the Bruins have to do?

First, sixth-seeded UCLA would have to get past its first-round game against 11th-seed Hurricanes (18-9) on Friday at the Georgia Dome in Atlanta.

If all goes according to plan, the Bruins would meet Michigan in the second round on Sunday.

The third-seeded Wolverines (24-8) could be a tough obstacle with large-bodied Robert "Tractor" Traylor posting inside which would cause problems for the undersized Bruins.

However, like UCLA, the Wolverines have shown signs of inconsistency throughout the year and it wouldn't be a complete shock for the Bruins to pull the upset.

Assuming a UCLA win, it's most likely that their opponent in the Sweet Sixteen would be No. 2 seed Kentucky (29-4). The Wildcats, who are trying to make their third-straight Final Four appearance, would be tough to beat. Kentucky dominates the boards and has a relentless defense, holding opponents to a 39 percent shooting clip.

While a win would be unlikely, there is a reason why they call the NCAA Tournament March Madness.

So UCLA would make it to the Elite Eight and it would be a shock if Duke didn't emerge from the other side of the South bracket for a re-match with the Bruins.

As evidenced by their 120-84 win over UCLA on Feb. 22, the Blue Devils (29-3) have proven themselves deep and deadly from the outside. And with Elton Brand back in the middle for Duke, its inside game is just as strong.

For UCLA to win here, nothing short of a miracle would be needed.

But then again, this is a Hollywood script and the Bruins would once again find themselves in San Antonio, the site of last year's UCLA tournament loss.

M. HOOPS

And it was a season defined by Toby Bailey, who, in frustration, slammed the ball off the backboard in Washington's Edmundson Pavilion two weeks ago as the final buzzer sounded, ending UCLA's amazing comeback attempt and leaving a bittersweet taste in their mouths once again.

But it was also a season defined by such unforgettable images as the amazing off-the-backboard alley-oop from Earl Watson to Baron Davis against Oregon State.

Then there was the three-pointer at the buzzer by Johnson to defeat Washington State in Pullman.

And who could ever forget the biggest smile anybody has seen on J.R. Henderson's face over the past four years when he was announced for the final time at Pauley Pavilion last Saturday?

Up, down. Up, down. There is no middle ground for the Bruins. They are a team that went 9-1 in its first 10 games, 7-3 in the following 10, and 5-5 to conclude the season. In the process, they were ranked as high as No. 6 – only a month and a half ago – but have proceeded to fall 13 spots since.

However, it was in the final three games of the season that the Bruins played their best. Leave it to this team to play its best three games of the season and lose two of them.

On March 1 against Washington, UCLA lollygagged through the first half and trailed by 16 at halftime. But the Bruins turned up the offensive and defensive intensity to come all the way back, only to lose by one.

Then last week, they handled a good Arizona State squad, 102-94, before losing to second-ranked Arizona in what was perhaps the Bruins' best effort of the season.

"As a team, we just grew strong as the season progressed," Johnson said. "It's like that every year."

The story of the Bruin season began way back in the summer. Having just endured one of the most tumultuous seasons ever, the Bruins were looking toward the future – and perhaps, a national title.

At least that's what the pros said.

Over the summer, various Bruins would take on NBA players such as Jalen Rose and Chris Mills in pick-up games in the Men's Gym – and win almost almost every time.

"We were beating them, and every time after we played they would be like, 'You guys better make the finals and if you don't we are going to beat you guys up,'" Bailey said. "Or they say, 'You guys better not do the same this year.'"

The expectations couldn't have been higher. With Bailey, Henderson, Johnson and McCoy returning, combined with blue-chip recruits Davis, Watson and Schea Cotton, UCLA knew there was nobody more talented.

Then came Hell Week.

The last week of September is not one the Bruins will soon forget – after all, it may have cost them their season.

On Sept. 25, Cotton – who was ranked as one of the best forward prospects in the nation – was ruled ruled academically ineligible.

Then, four days later, McCoy and Johnson were inexplicably and indefinitely suspended.

In a span of five days, the Bruins metamorphosed from an extremely deep team to one with no bench strength or continuity whatsoever.

"We would have had a chance right from the get-go to get chemistry going and having everybody on the same page," Henderson said. "But we never really got a chance to do that."

Though Johnson would be re-instated before the season began, he would miss the first four games, leaving the Bruins with three freshman starters along with Henderson and Bailey.

And it didn't help that that the first contest was against currently top-ranked North Carolina in Alaska.

In the opening-round game of the Great Alaska Shootout, the Tar Heels dominated from start to finish and handed the Bruins their second worst loss in school history, 109-68.

The size disadvantage became truly evident, as

UNC outrebounded the Bruins 45-28 and shot 63 percent from the field, while UCLA made only 40 percent of its shots.

The following Monday – coincidentally or not – the 6-foot-10-inch McCoy was re-instated to the practice squad, though he would not play in a game until a month later.

The Bruins would not lose a game until January. Among the victories in the ensuing nine-game winning streak was their only win of the season against a ranked team (New Mexico), which also was the last game Johnson would not play.

In that span were victories over tourney-bound Northern Arizona, St. Louis, UNLV and – in McCoy's first game back – Illinois.

Everything was just fine for a while. The Bruins were winning – at one point they were 17-3 – and continuity had re-surfaced.

Then came Hell Week, Part II, only this time it lasted longer.

A loss at Oregon was followed by a loss to Stanford at home, a game in which the Bruins had every opportunity to win but didn't.

Then came the big news.

McCoy was gone. He resigned, citing "intense media pressure" and a desire to let his teammates have less distractions.

Two days later, as if things weren't bad enough, Bailey was kicked out of practice and benched for the Bruins' upcoming game against USC. Bailey: the player who had found a way to avoid all the suspensions, punishments and problems over the years.

One had to wonder if things would ever get better for the Bruins.

It didn't. At least not immediately.

Over the next three games, the Bruins barely beat two of the Pac-10's worst clubs – USC in overtime and WSU at the buzzer – and got drilled at Duke by 36 points.

The following game at Washington, UCLA played its worst 20 minutes of the season and trailed by 16 at halftime. Yet that was the game where they turned it around.

They made an amazing comeback only to fall one-point short, then won their game against ASU and played solidly against Arizona.

And that's where they stand today.

Are they the team that went 9-1 to start the season? Or are they the team that got beat by Duke and North Carolina by a combined 77 points?

Are they the team that for so many games, just did not look as though they put forth their full effort – and the scoreboard revealed it? Or are they the team that everyone has seen for the last week – a team that can compete with anybody?

At some point over the next three weeks, the Bruins will discover where they stand in the national picture. And the Bruins are confident that they are at the top of the spectrum.

"I still have a funny feeling that we are going to surprise a lot of people in the tournament," Johnson said. "People don't know it yet, I don't think we know it yet, but when the tournament comes we'll be ready."

If not, it will be a very quick end to a very long season.

W. HOOPS

"We have always felt that we had a lot of talent on this team, but we didn't know when we put it all together," Olivier said. "They stayed focused and did things we wanted them to do and they all believe in what we were doing, which is huge for any team."

When the seniors took it upon themselves to stand up and talk to the team on that fateful December day, they reminded the players of this.

"I loved it," Olivier said about the impromptu speeches by the seniors. "To be honest, that's what makes the team that much better, when the team is running the team. They know that if everyone is on the page and everyone has the same goals it just makes us all that much stronger."

MOORE

1993, going just 51-57, only to resurge this season. Why do you believe the Bruins stumbled?

I think everything goes in cycles. I think it was just a matter of recruiting. I think Kathy (Olivier) has done an excellent job of recruiting. If the student athletes are not out there, you can't recruit them in. So I think the recruiting pool for UCLA in the West just wasn't there. I think Kathy's first year, Natalie (Williams) got hurt and they were young the last couple of years.

What are your thoughts on UCLA head coach Kathy Olivier and what she's been able to do this season?

I think she has been obviously doing a wonderful job this year. The thing I know about coaching though is that she probably has worked just as hard and probably done just as good a job the last couple years, but the win-loss record hasn't been there. It takes a lot more to coach with less talent than when you have the talent. She's probably done just a great coaching job the last couple of years to get the wins she got.

The only time a UCLA women's basketball team captured the national title was when your team did it in 1978. How much longer do you think it will be before another one?

It seems to me that it would be appropriate if it were to happen in 1998. But you just don't know. I really think this team has a big opportunity to have a big impact in the NCAAs. Because if you look at the team you will see that they are a sophomore team. Obviously next year and the year after that they will be tough. What is important is that they are going to get into the post-season and the players will get to experience the tournament. The players will get a feel for what it means, the excitement and the electricity involved with it. The further the team goes into it, the better the experience. And that carries over to next season. So hopefully within the next couple years UCLA will have an opportunity to win one.

Do you think the success of this season proves that the Bruins are back to the heights you took them?

Everything cycles. So you would like to think it is. It's a team that has good balance, good chemistry and all the ingredients that is takes to be successful for years. If you talk to Kathy and people around the program, they will tell you that so much of that is based on recruiting. They put together a good recruiting class that happens to be sophomores right now, and they have some seniors on their team. If you look game in and game out, the key contributors to the program are underclassmen. Hopefully the UCLA women's basketball program has arrived this year and will stay in the national picture.

TOURNAMENT

North Carolina (another top-ranked team) in overtime.

One match-up to look for should be that of the centers. Michigan's 6-foot-3 All-Big Ten First-teamer Pollyanna Johns will go up against the Bruins' 6-foot-4 sophomore Janae Hubbard. Johns averaged 18.2 points this year, and led the conference with 9.6 rebounds and a .620 field goal percentage while Hubbard averaged 10.7 in points, 5.8 in rebounds, and .534 in field goal percentage. However, after her career highs in both points (26) and rebounds (18) against Washington State, few doubt Hubbard's mettle or muscle.

If they win, the Bruins will face the winner of the Alabama-NC Greensboro game.

Much of Alabama's success is due to junior guard Dominique Canty, one of the best players in the nation, who averages 21 points, 7 rebounds, and 5 assists.

If the Bruins have to play Alabama, they will have to deal with the pressure of playing in front of a spirited squad. But, the Bruins are used to playing under pressure. A win against Alabama will certainly be one of the biggest for the Bruins.

Find out what respect means to the Pac-10. This weekend, five out of the 10 schools in the Pac-10 have spots in the tournament.

Stanford sits atop of the West as the No.1 seed. Stanford's only Pac-10 defeat came at the hands of Arizona, but the Cardinal later avenged that loss by burning the Wildcats for 108 points at Maples Pavilion, where they have not lost since 1994 in 59 straight games. In

STUDENT SPORTS PACKAGES

Applications for 1998-99 Student Sports Packages (SSP) are now available at the Central Ticket Office (West Center) and Student Union Office (A-Level, Ackerman Union). Completed applications will be accepted beginning Monday, March 16 at 9:00 am at the Pauley Pavilion Ticket Office.

The first 500 applicants will receive a UCLA SSP for the 1998-99 sports year. All other applications received will be entered into a random draw to be held in late July.

Each SSP will admit the bearer to all five home football games, the men's basketball games listed under the plan that you choose and all other regularly scheduled home athletic events next year.

Applicants must use an official application in its original form. Each applicant may submit one application and request a maximum of one SSP. They are non-transferable. You must be a currently enrolled UCLA student, possess a UCLA student ID and ticket to get into the games.

Unsuccessful applications will be sent notification and a refund in the mail between August 19 and 28.

Because of the high demand for men's basketball tickets, we do not anticipate that tickets will be available to individual games next season.

Assuming UCLA is participating in a post-season football bowl game, or in the NCAA Basketball Tournament, only those students who apply for an SSP will be eligible to purchase those tickets.

Seating locations at UCLA venues are similar to last year. All student seating continues to be festival style general admission, except for the UCLA-USC football game where your prepaid priority number is exchanged for a reserved seat.

For more information on UCLA SSP policies and procedures and the random draw, pick up an application at the Central Ticket Office or Student Union.

SENIORS

ready to redeem itself from the loss. But off-the-court drama would test the resolve of the team.

Two weeks before the season began, UCLA dismissed head coach Jim Harrick for recruiting violations and lying on an expense report. The trauma of losing their head coach revealed itself on the court.

Despite the fact that the Bruins were a team of returning talent, they struggled early in the season. However, UCLA would persevere through the loss of its head coach and through some humiliating defeats like its 48-point loss to Stanford. The Bruins would jell at the end of the year and put together a 12-game winning streak that would take them all the way to the Elite Eight.

Yet if there were to be a silver lining to the three-year roller coaster ride, it is this: Their experiences provided the trio with a solid foundation to become the senior leaders needed by the six Bruin freshman to deal with a season with more cast changes and plot twists than an episode of Melrose Place.

"You don't just become a leader overnight and they've been groomed to take over this role for three years," said former Bruin Charles O'Bannon, who knows about providing senior leadership during tumultuous times. "Their turn finally came and I think that they handled it well."

Before the summer, things boded well for the Bruins who had four talented returning players and a highly regarded recruiting class. It seemed as if the seniors would end their careers the way they began it – taking part in the Final Four.

But in the span of a week things began to crumble. Star recruit Schea Cotton's SAT scores were invalidated by the NCAA, making him ineligible to play. Then four days later UCLA suspended Johnson and Jelani McCoy. The result of the early drama – a 41-point season opening loss to North Carolina.

The year would be marked with constant roster alterations – the reinstatement of the suspended players and then the resignation of McCoy. Stability became a foreign word.

"My whole career has always been like that here," Henderson said, "just a lot of changes, a lot of things to deal with. You kind of get immune to it, like nothing else could happen to us."

Regardless of the happenings outside the hardwood, the three seniors have helped the team compile a 22-8 record, finish third in the conference behind two top 10 teams and earn a sixth seed in their fourth-straight NCAA Tournament appearance.

"They've been kind of the pillars of strength for our program during the last two years during a very difficult time," UCLA head coach Steve Lavin said. "When you look at all the peaks and valleys that we've had over the last two seasons, the one consistent thing that we've had is their performance."

By the end of the conference season, it was obvious that the seniors were the go-to-guys, just as Charles O'Bannon and Cameron Dollar were last year and Ed O'Bannon, Edney and Zidek were in the 1995 season.

Johnson has been the clutch shooter for the Bruins, while Bailey showed that he could take matters into his own hands in the overtime victory against USC on Feb. 18 and in his 32-point second-half performance versus Washington on Mar. 1. And Henderson, well, when he watched most of the game from the bench in foul trouble against Duke, the Blue Devils defeated the Bruins by 36 points. A coincidence? Not likely.

"That is our role as the three seniors," Johnson said. "That is our responsibility, to carry the team. We want all the pressure, we want all the challenges."

The threesome don't limit their leadership to the court. Off-the-court, they also provide inspiration for the younger Bruins.

"People say that we don't have great leaders, but I think that they are wrong," freshman Rico Hines said. "I think that Toby, Kris and J.R. are great leaders and great guys."

Each senior brings a different style of leadership to the team.

"I think Toby is more of a quiet leader as far as just through his work ethic in practice," freshman Baron Davis said. "Kris is the more vocal leader, you know just really gets us fired up. And J.R., I think he's just the overall leader, the guy who, when he speaks, everyone listens."

As their time as Bruins wind down to mere minutes, the last vestige of the championship squad hopes to give to the six freshman what they received during their own freshman campaign – a trip to the Final Four.

And when the last second ticks off the clock the Bruin trinity will leave their mark as a class without peers.

"I don't think any senior class has been through what we've been through as far as ups and downs and growing up in the public eye," Johnson said. "I think that the freshman see it on our faces, I mean we've been through a lot – turmoil and jubilation, everything. Any emotion that you can describe we've been through here at UCLA.

"I'm sure that when we leave here there won't be another class like us."

"because she distributes the ball so well, it's fun for the girls to play with her."

You understand winning. For you that has always meant not having "any individual goals."

"It's not about honors or accolades or nothing like that: It's about personal satisfaction."

You may remember for one brief instant what it was like to be the woman that Olivier said "can go forever." You may remember what it's like to be able to defiantly retort "I don't ask to come out of the game."

Those are the last four years of Gomez's life. Now you, the reader, can understand how she may feel.

And when word of her tournament games reaches you, maybe you'll remember the pressure she faces.

Maybe you'll remember the East Coast product who rarely gets this chance to play collegiate basketball in front of her family.

Maybe you'll remember the no-win situation that finals are just two weeks away, but she can't focus on them until the team loses.

If nothing else, try to remember a woman who has a little bit of everything and a whole lot of promise.

short: don't ever expect an early exit from the Cardinal if they play at home.

The only team in the conference to beat the Cardinal this year is Arizona. The No. 3 seed in the east, the Wildcats shouldn't have any problem with 14th seed Santa Clara, but should expect a fight from Virginia if they meet in the second round. Should the Wildcats survive that they would probably be congratulated by UConn, right before Connecticut attempts to prove whether they can still compete with the absence of Nykesha Sales.

The other conference teams change, then, from the one and three seeds of Stanford and Arizona to the 12 and 13 seeds of Oregon and Washington. The Ducks (17-9, 13-5) have been steady and consistent all year. They probably clinched their berth in the final weeks when they went into overtime at Arizona State and won 69-67 and had a strong game at home in the final week of the season against Stanford before falling 79-71. Oregon, though, is a No.12 seed, and as a consequence must face No. 5 seed Rutgers. The Scarlet Knights pulled off a miracle win against UConn in the regular season on a buzzer-beating half-court shot; the Huskies avenged that loss by beating up on Rutgers in the Big East Championship game. As solid a team as Oregon may claim to be, though, don't expect the Scarlet Knights to be damsels in distress against the Ducks.

Perhaps the greatest testimony to the strength of the Pac-10, however, may be seen in the fate of Washington. Starting the season 10-0, with wins over Kansas, Iowa, Vanderbilt and NC State, the Huskies finished the season (9-9) in the conference. All of Washington's losses came from Pac-10 teams. The Huskies garnered the No. 13 seed and will face the No. 6 seeded Clemson Tigers in a tournament appearance.

With UCLA and other powerful constituents representing the Pac-10 playing in the tournament, there will definitely be a lot to talk about during March Madness.

Work-study gives students flexibility, experience

FINANCE: Bruins battle time difficulties but need cash to make ends meet

By Ann Hawkey and Lawrence Ferchaw
Daily Bruin Contributors

When grants, loans and scholarships do not provide the whole solution, UCLA students must look for employment to meet their financial needs.

"I have no money, my parents have no money, and nobody wants to give me money. So, I have to work," said Jane Lee, a second-year student who works part time at the UCLA Medical Center.

She is not alone. Students on work-study number over 3,000, and the Associated Students of UCLA (ASUCLA) employs at least another 1,500. However, these figures do not reflect the total number of students working both on and off campus.

Many students use these jobs to cover different expenses of school, including registration fees, books and commuting costs.

"I have financial aid, but most of my tuition is paid for by scholarships," said Baudelia Chavez, a third-year student. "The only thing that's not paid for is my books, and that's why I work."

Chavez works 15 to 20 hours each week as a senior student supervisor at ASUCLA's Campus Corner. Next quarter she will also use her paychecks to help pay rent at home.

Although on-campus jobs may pay less and not provide as much relevant experience for future careers, some students see great benefits in working for ASUCLA or other school organizations. Many cited flexibility as a good reason to work on campus.

"If I have a test, I can go in late," said Laura Moller. "Other places don't allow this."

Moller works at BookZone in the UCLA Store. She said she enjoys the benefits of working for ASUCLA because it allows her to coordinate her work schedule around her classes, allowing her to focus on academics.

Work-study employees find academics to be not only a priority, but a necessity. Students must meet a minimum grade point average, as established by their college, to remain in the program.

Awards of work-study funds are determined by financial need. Students work to earn the $1,800 available a year through a variety of jobs both on and off campus. They have their choice of jobs that have been designated as

Program saves money, conserves environment

RESOURCES: Campus utilities' needs met in Earth-friendly fashion

By Marisa Wong
Daily Bruin Contributor

As students sit in class, drink from water fountains or walk home, joules and cents are being saved by the minute.

With a co-generator to provide the campus with electricity (and other initiatives to save resources), the school joins many other colleges nationwide in the effort to conserve both money and the environment.

In a report released by the National Wildlife Federation (NWF), college campuses are engaging in many cost-effective environmental-improvement projects.

Of the 15 universities and colleges the NWF profiled, an average of $728,500 per campus was saved through conservation initiatives.

Although UCLA was not highlighted in this report, Assistant Vice Chancellor Jack Powazek said the school has probably saved more than the national average through numerous energy conservation projects.

Because UCLA has its own power plant, electricity does not have to be bought through other companies – a very cost-effective measure which will serve to be greatly beneficial in the long run, Powazek said.

The plant uses both natural gas and landfill gas to fuel the campus with electricity. The landfill gas would otherwise be destroyed if it were not consumed by the plant.

In addition, the heat by-product from this process is used to generate the steam which provides the school with cooling, heating and more electricity.

"The power plant is extremely energy efficient," said David Johnson, Director of Energy Services. "And whenever we have any money, our goal is to try and have the cost level below the funding level."

Powazek estimates that $40 million in replacement costs have been saved because of the power plant which began generating in 1994.

The original chillers were no longer able to generate their own cold water, and so a water transport system from the plant was designed so new chillers would not have to be installed. Sixty chillers were saved, along with millions of dollars, because the plant was able to provide the cold water needed.

The energy department is also working to replace the lighting system with more energy efficient light bulbs.

Aspiring lawyers hound job market

LAW SCHOOL: Renewed interest about justice increases applications

By Emi Kojima
Daily Bruin Contributor

Lawyers have been called everything from liars to sharks to scumbags.

"I tell people that I'm an English major, and people look down on me; I tell people that I want to go to law school, and people look down on me," said Stephanie Lasker, a fourth-year American literature student, laughing.

UCLA students who hope to become lawyers, however, raise objections to the predominant stereotypes.

"It's hard to stereotype (law students) because they are a very diverse group of people," said Amy Berenson Mallow, assistant dean for career services.

Students attend law school with many different motivations. Some seek security, some want to change society, and some like the intellectual challenge.

"I just wanted to understand the law as this huge tool, a power play that allows people to take what they want," said Robert Sorensen, second-year law student.

He decided to enter law school after being accused of murder.

"All (the police) wanted to do was to solve the case even though the composite pictures didn't look anything like me," Sorensen said, "I think that's frightening."

Whatever the case, UCLA's law-school applications have increased for the first time since 1991, according to Andrea Sossin Bergman, assistant dean of admissions.

Also, "admissions have increased about 8 percent," she said. They are above the national average.

She mentioned that the improvement in the economy may have affected the higher number of applications this year.

The jobs in which law-school graduates actually end up also heavily depends upon the market trends and government funding.

"There's a good job market for lawyers, said Zareh Jaltorossian, second-year law student. "When getting a Ph.D., the job prospects are uncertain," he said.

Going to law school is "just a way of getting a job," he said.

But the economic circumstances of the market also limits the number of jobs in certain sectors of the law.

For example, government funding determines how many people will be hired into public interest law. Government funding, in turn, is affected by the economy.

Public interest is the field of law in which lawyers traditionally try to help the community and oppressed groups. While law schools categorize it separately from the public and private sectors, it actually plays a role in both of these fields.

Recently, there has been a surge of new public interest programs for law-school students.

Many undergraduates hope to enter into the law program to practice public-interest law.

"I'm interested in going to law school so that I can make the law work for people who need it," said Kim Curtis, a second-year women's studies student.

"This summer I worked with a female manager who was sexually harassed. I wished at the time that I was a lawyer so that I could help her," she said.

This is the first year the UCLA Law School has a program in public interest law, with 27 students in the program.

This year showed an increase in the number of applicants to the public interest program.

The job market, however, remains

COMMUNITY BRIEFS

USAC, CALPIRG, GSA fight for financial aid

Three UCLA student groups came together Thursday to "fight for financial aid" by launching a letter-writing campaign to Congress.

Representatives from USAC, Graduate Students' Association (GSA, and California Public Interest Research Group (CALPIRG) gathered in Royce quad to urge students to sign postcards, write letters and even call representatives to voice their concerns over legislation designed to cut back financial aid.

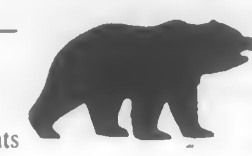
"It is crucial that students work together to ensure that financial aid is protected in the upcoming millennium," said USAC President Kandea Mosley.

President Clinton's most recent budget has dramatically cut several key financial-aid programs, which was the impetus for students organizing on this issue.

The letters and postcards were directed to Rep. John Kasich, R-OH, the House Budget Committee Chair.

"We are out here to let Representative Kasich and President Clinton know that students will not silently watch as their financial aid is cut," said USAC External Vice President Stacy Lee.

Organizers said that they had gathered over 300 signatures from students who passed by.



Affirmative Action rally protests at Berkeley

A group of UC Berkeley students, professors and community members rallied on Sproul Plaza on Thursday in a drive to place an affirmative action initiative on the November 1998 election ballot.

Students for Educational Opportunity, a campus group that supports affirmative action, organized the rally to show its support for the Equal Educational Opportunity Initiative. The proposed measure, drawn up by Boalt Hall students, is aimed at reinstating affirmative action policies in all California public schools. The proposed initiative also attempts to eliminate a portion of Proposition 209 – the voter-approved 1996 measure that abolished affirmative action in all public institutions.

"The rally is intended to galvanize people around the issue," said Rashad Ibrahim, a third-year Boalt student who is coordinating the rally. "Berkeley is a place for people to express themselves. Folks who don't have the money or control of the media have an outlet."

In order to place the initiative on the November 1998 ballot, the organization must gather 770,000 signatures by April 17. But as a safeguard, they plan to gather at least 1.2 million signatures.

"We can't afford to wait," said Andrea Guerrero, a second-year law student and the initiative's co-author. "Each year we wait, we lose tens and thousands of students."

If the students cannot gather the necessary signatures, they will have to wait until the year 2000 to place the item on the ballot.

According to Guerrero, they have less than half of the necessary signatures. But she said that between 100,000 and 200,000 fliers are being circulated to publicize the initiative. The organization has also established an extensive network that spans at least 30 universities across the state.

UC Berkeley African-American studies Professor June Jordan and ethnic studies Professor Ronald Takaki both spoke.

"When they announce (the break down of this year's entering fall class), it will be like an earthquake," Takaki said, pointing to a study by the university that projected next year's freshman class as 93 percent white and Asian American.

But Chris Gray, president of the Berkeley College Republicans, said that the students should not try to alter Proposition 209.

"They ought to just live with it for a little while to see how it goes," Gray said. "It's just sour grapes. They can't live with what the voters do."

Breaking out

By [illegible]
Daily Bruin Contributor

[illegible] a few years ago, Palm Springs was the [illegible] Spring Break location, and college students from everywhere went there to party. But after the passing of [illegible], such as the banning of the [illegible] many students are [illegible] place to go.

"They've really [illegible] down now," said Jory [illegible], a third-year English student, referring to Palm Springs. "There are too many old people."

"But," he joked, "they have a good shuffleboard contest. And bingo."

Spring break has traditionally been the time to relax in the sun on beaches like South Padre Island in Texas, Cancun in Mexico and Panama City Beach in Florida. So where do students at UCLA go for spring break?

Mexico

Home of Cancun, Matzatlan, San Felipe, Rosarito ... Everyone who lives on campus has received those shiny flyers that advertise the adventures of Rosarito Beach.

Elias Encino, a first-year film student, is helping organize a spring break trip there for friends. They intend to drive down to Rosarito for the week because there, said Encino, "You have the beach and good Mexican food, and everyone's there for one purpose: to party their asses off."

But, according to Mike Mirhadi, a third-year microbiology student, it is important to prepare well ahead of time. Last spring break, Mirhadi and four friends drove down to Rosarito, arrived after lunch, attempted to check into a hotel – and found out all the hotels had restricted access.

"You had to have these wristbands to get into the hotel – any hotel – and we didn't know this at all. I had to lie and say that my friends and I were surfing earlier and that we took off our wristbands and lost them. And I tried to act like a surfer and say 'dude' and 'man' and all that," Mirhadi said. Six hours later, a hotel finally sold Mirhadi and friends "new" wristbands for $20 each.

Things only got worse for the group when one of Mirhadi's friends nearly got arrested for attempting to smuggle beer into the hotel – "the cop even pulled out his handcuffs" – and Mirhadi ended the trip with another complaint: "Worst of all, you have to pay $30 to go to any club – $30 for an overcrowded dancing area, cheap beer and lots of decadence."

"It was an interesting experience, but not something I want to repeat."

Anne Marie Wear, a second-year theater student, has fonder memories of Mexico. Wear went camping with friends on the sands of San Felipe, where there are numerous water-sport activities. An aspect of the San Felipe beach that stands out, however, is its unique tidal change.

"You can walk on the beach for miles when there's a low tide," Wear mused. "We would find sand dollars bigger than our hands."

Lodging price in Rosarito: about $75 for a hotel.

San Francisco

San Francisco is a city of cafés, culture and character. Many attractions make it a unique visiting place, such as Japantown, Chinatown, Little Italy, Fisherman's Wharf and more.

"There's culture there – it's more European than L.A.," said Rachel Factor, a third-year communication studies student.

"People are more laid back up there," added Yinlan Zhang, a third-year geography student.

Both recalled experiences that made San Francisco memorable to them.

"I remember going to Café Claude, this French café that was in an alley, where there was a lot of jazz," said Zhang. "After they closed, we were still there, and we hung out with the band, and the bartender gave us some free drinks. We just sat there and chatted until 3 or 4 in the morning."

Factor appreciates the views people can get of the city and bay when they find the right spot, the many jazz clubs, and the good food. There are also many areas around San Francisco that are enjoyable, such as Napa Valley, Sausalito and Santa Cruz.

"San Francisco's just a neat place," she added. "I feel like going there now."

Lodging price: $25-$26 for a hostel.

Las Vegas

For those who don't want to spend their spring break outdoors, the bright lights of Las Vegas and other Nevada cities beckon.

"It's Sin City, man," said Keith Tam, a third-year business economics student who is going to Las Vegas this Spring Break with Alpha Phi Omega, a coed service-oriented fraternity. For the first time ever, Tam will actually be able to gamble.

"I never had the chance to pull an actual slot machine," he said, "and besides, my luck has been good recently."

Lodging price: $45-$125 for a hotel.

Mammoth

People who favor colder weather will find it more worthwhile to participate in some of America's favorite pastimes: skiing and snowboarding. Tina Bishop, a first-year undeclared student, will be spending her spring break skiing at Mammoth.

"It has the best skiing around. You can't find double-black diamonds anywhere else," she said.

If spring break is so famous for being a fun-in-the-sun type of vacation, why did Bishop choose snow over sun?

"Because building snowmen is better than building sand castles," she laughed.

Lodging: Bishop is paying $250 for a condo with other people for the week.

Why

Red, green, black, blue, which color's right for you?

The nearer South Campus gets, the louder the noise gets: "click, click, click." Natives of the "less attractive" side of UCLA know it's the incessant sound that comes from using those notorious four-color pens.

The bulky utensil is both loved and hated over there. Yet it seems that more and more students are trading in their boring, monochromatic pens for one that's four times the fun.

The only problem is the irritating noise it makes when switching colors. To buy or not to buy, that is the dilemma.

From the sound of it, more are opting to shell out the extra dough to be a proud owner of a four-color pen ... but why?

"Because those pains-in-the-ass heard it could get them into med school."

Ideas for spring break

Santa Barbara

And then there are the beaches of California. Jory Chavez traveled to Santa Barbara with friends last year and did what many students set out to do during spring break: he got drunk. Chavez recalls consuming a large amount of alcohol, sleeping for about 10 hours and throwing up.

His friend finished his particular version of the story: "Four of us had to pick him up, drag him to the bathroom, strip him down and throw cold water all over him."

There were other attractions besides the drinking, however, such as bike racing.

"There were these bikes there with four wheels that you could rent from the beach and we were just having fun."

Lodging price: the cheapest hotel on the Net costs $95.

Home

Despite some people's dreams of the wild spring break that B-movies are made of, spring break does not have to be a party scene. For many people, it's just a good time to go home and relax after a demanding winter quarter.

"I'm going home to sleep, relax and bond with all my old friends. I'm a little homesick; I don't feel like going away for spring break," said Veronica Martinez, a first-year undeclared student. "I want to watch movies, get drunk and lay by the pool."

Spring break could be either a full week of partying for memories that last a lifetime or simply a time to relax and visit old friends. Arthur Lee, a fourth-year psychobiology student, fondly recalled his trip to Disneyland.

"I got stuck on the 'It's A Small World' ride and hung out with the Dutch people."

On a more serious note, he remembered one enjoyable spring break he had when he and his friends drove up Highway 1. "Every time we reached a beach, we stopped the car and ran out, touched sand, and got into a huge sandball fight. Then we ran back in the car and drove on to the next beach."

The important thing to most people is just spending time with friends. "It's just fun to soak up some warm sun and talk with good friends," said Wear.

And if there's really nothing else to do, there's always MTV's spring break special.

JOBS

work-study.

In a special program within work-study, students involved in community service jobs can earn up to $5,000 each year. This can include tutoring and volunteering to aid in medical clinics.

Student employees often need to find ways to balance work and studying, ensuring that academics take priority. Scheduling work around classes and even budgeting time specifically for studying are some ways students maximize the time they have available.

This can mean making large sacrifices and giving up personal time in order to fund their education.

"If I want to volunteer for things, I can't because of my work schedule," said Chavez. "I have to worry about work first."

Some students give up more than extracurricular activities. Working through school can mean an entirely different lifestyle.

"I had to give up basically all of my recreation," said Maggi Michel, a senior transfer-student. "I don't have time for casual friends or catching movies."

Michel, a part-time student, has held the same full-time job for over two years to support herself and pay her registration fees. During this time, she has maintained a 3.92 grade point average, and also spent six months as the Daily Bruin's assistant director of electronic media. She is now an editor and contributor to Bang!, an anthology put together by the English department.

Michel credits much of her success to her time-management skills. Each quarter, she plans out when her deadlines will fall and schedules in advance what she needs to do to meet these deadlines. Also, she does not waste any free time.

"Whenever I've got 15 to 20 minutes, if I can get to a computer, I can get stuff done," said Michel.

Time management does have its limits. After six months of juggling work, school and her position at the Bruin, Michel needed to give something up. She decided to leave her job at the Bruin.

Many working students report a similar lack of time to do all that they need to do.

"It would be crazy to say it doesn't put a strain on their time," said Jennifer Brydges, a counselor in the Career Center. "I really admire the majority of them."

One way students can conserve time is to study while working. Some students' jobs allow them to do both.

As a resident assistant (RA), one of Hieu Ho's responsibilities includes being in his room on certain nights each week for residents to come to him for counseling. Often, he can use this time to do schoolwork when he is not busy working with residents.

Though she cannot study while on the clock, Michel often uses classroom experience. The focus of her major on cultural studies gives her the opportunity to apply what she has learned to her job at an international company.

"The material I was studying was relevant to them," said Michel. "I've had the opportunity to do several interesting projects."

This chance to bring school experiences into the workplace, along with convenience and relevance to studies, play large roles in student jobs, but students consider other factors as well. Personal rewards often accompany student jobs.

"You challenge yourself (as an RA) by taking responsibility for helping out eighty-some people," said Ho.

Along with working as an RA in Sproul Hall, Ho also works part-time as an administrative assistant for JobTrak, a job search service. He does this to help pay his registration fees while his job as an RA pays for his housing and food.

Some students see personal rewards in the future applications of their current jobs. Often when they look for jobs, students hope for one in which they can learn skills for future jobs.

"They want to kill two birds with one stone," said Brydges. "They want to get the experience they need and to pay for school."

ENVIRONMENT

outdoor lighting and general-assignment classrooms, are in the process of converting from florescent lights to a more energy efficient system.

Powazek said they have reduced electrical energy consumption in public spaces by approximately 25 percent, and they hope to expand the project to departmental space.

The energy department has also saved billions of gallons of water by reusing consumable water which would otherwise be drained out.

In the 1990 fiscal year, UCLA consumed 1 billion gallons of water, compared to 1996 when the school only used 665.7 million gallons – a 36 percent reduction due to the reuse of water. A water bill reduction of about 20 percent is saved campus wide, Johnson said. UCLA's water bill is annually from $2 million to $3 million.

The school captures water that was used for cooling equipment in many of the science buildings and reuses it in the co-generator; 60 percent of the water used for operations is water already used elsewhere.

Reduction valves have also been installed in campus toilets and urinals to save the amount of water consumed in each flush, and 60 aspirators (equipment used to create vacuums) have been purchased that do not require the water the old ones needed.

"The campus effort is not only to be an example of what can be done to help conserve the environment, but to also save money," Johnson said. "We try to be cost efficient as well as environmentally conscience."

Additionally, Marc Hankin, a patent attorney, cautioned idealists that they should have "no illusions about the law."

"It's like trench warfare most of the time," he said.

Approximately 2.5 percent of UCLA Law School graduates go into into public interest law, in comparison with 66 percent who have jobs in private practice and 13 percent who go into corporate practice

Clinton to use Africa trip to address scars of slavery

WASHINGTON: President will not issue apology for actions, spokesman says

By Sonya Ross
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – President Clinton will address "the legacy of slavery" and its scars on America during his historic trip to Africa – but will not use the occasion to issue an apology, the White House said Thursday.

White House spokesman Mike McCurry said Clinton is avoiding the apology issue during his tour of six African nations because it is "extraneous and off the point." The president has also declined to address the matter in the context of the national dialogue on race relations he began in June.

"The president is confident that that is not an issue that is central on the minds of any category of Americans," McCurry said. "He certainly is going to talk about the legacy of slavery and the scar that it represents on America. But this other question ... is very far off the mark when it comes to what real work we need to do."

A few black leaders have called on Clinton to issue an apology to the descendants of slaves. The president has been cool to the idea, saying that he might consider an apology only if it is recommended by his race advisory board.

Another official said Clinton would speak about historic ties between Africa and America during a speech in Senegal at Goree Island, once a major hub of the slave trade.

For centuries, two nations on Clinton's itinerary, Ghana and Senegal, served as operation bases for shipping African captives into slavery in North and South America. As a symbolic gesture in 1994, a group of Ghanaian chiefs performed a ceremony of atonement for slavery for a group of black Americans, a move that many Ghanaians considered offensive.

Melvin Foote, executive director of the private advocacy group Constituency for Africa, said Clinton is wise to steer clear of a slavery apology while in Africa.

"He's not going on the trip just to appease African Americans. He's trying to get Americans to deal with Africa in a more useful way," Foote said. "This is not the time or the place. That apology stuff is symbolic to me. I want some meat and potatoes."

Besides Ghana and Senegal, Clinton will visit Uganda, Botswana, South Africa and Rwanda in his 12-day tour of Africa, the longest visit to the continent by any U.S. president. He is looking to reshape American perceptions of Africa, and will stress a plan to bolster U.S. trade and investment there.

"There is too much to gain to be idle, and too much to lose from indifference," said Susan Rice, assistant secretary of state for Africa. "We must not allow the failures and the seeming intractable problems of Africa to obscure its great promise."

The president also wants improved relations with Africa out of security concerns, hoping to enlist African leaders in containing the threat from such nations such as Iraq, Libya and Sudan.

That concerns Sen. John Ashcroft, R-Mo., chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee on African Affairs. He asked Clinton Thursday to clarify U.S. policy toward Congo, Rwanda, Uganda, Ethiopia and Eritrea, where new leaders have replaced "some of the most corrupt and brutal governments in Africa."

Marine fight crew found at fault for cable car crash

ITALY: Jet was flying too fast, low; fliers may face charges of manslaughter

By Candice Hughes
The Associated Press

AVIANO, Italy – The crew of a Marine fighter jet that flew too fast and dived too low through the Italian Alps may face manslaughter charges for killing 20 people in a cable car, the Marines said Thursday. The U.S. ambassador apologized and knelt in prayer at the site where the people died.

An Italian prosecutor said he would continue his investigation into the accident, but, in general, Italians seemed satisfied with American assurances the Marines would face some sort of punishment in the United States.

A Marine investigation board placed the blame Thursday squarely on the four-man crew, who they said broke the rules on how fast and how low they could fly.

Their commanding officer said he would convene the military equivalent of a criminal grand jury.

"The cause of the mishap was aircrew error," Maj. Gen. Michael P. DeLong, president of the investigation board, told reporters at the U.S. air base in Avjano.

The EA-6B Prowler severed two of the ski lift cables, sending a gondola with 19 skiers from six countries and the operator to their deaths on the snowy slopes. The plane struck the cable just 370 feet above the ground.

The incident soured Italian-American relations, sparking protests at Aviano, calls to close U.S. bases throughout Italy and charges that American fliers routinely "hot-dog" in Italian airspace.

On Thursday, U.S. Ambassador Thomas Foglietta knelt at the Cavalese ski lift in silent prayer for the victims of one of the deadliest training incidents since the end of the Cold War.

"On behalf of President Clinton and the American people, I wish to apologize," he said.

Italy said it wants to prosecute the fliers, but under a NATO treaty the United States has the right to refuse, and it is expected to do so. The crew will remain at Aviano until a decision is made.

Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon, asked whether there was any chance that the men would be handed over to Italian authorities, said "It would be very unusual."

But he added the matter has been taken up by the U.S. commander in chief in Europe, Gen. Wesley Clark, who would make the final decision.

Massimo Brutti, Italy's undersecretary of defense, told reporters at Aviano the board's report was enough to hold the crew "criminally responsible" and said agrees with the findings of the Italian air force.

European Union leaders met Thursday in London with colleagues from 11 candidate nations to discuss illegal drugs, organized crime, pollution and the crackdown on ethnic Albanians in Kosovo.

European Union reviews applications

SUMMIT: Potential members examined, but some nations snubbed

By Robert Wielaard
The Associated Press

LONDON – European Union leaders met Thursday with counterparts from 11 neighboring states, but talks about expansion were overshadowed by concerns about the Serbian crackdown on ethnic Albanians in Kosovo.

The 26-nation summit was aimed at establishing the relevance of EU's ambitious enlargement drive, three weeks before formal membership talks open with 10 East European nations and Cyprus.

Opening the talks in an ornate room at Lancaster House, British Prime Minister Tony Blair called it "only the beginning of the process of our reconciliation of the two parts of Europe."

The goal of nearly doubling the EU ranks, Blair added, is to make Europe "stable, secure, peaceful and prosperous." Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic, Slovenia, Estonia and Cyprus are on a fast track for membership, although they won't join for five or six years. The admission of Latvia, Romania, Lithuania, Bulgaria and Slovakia is far more distant.

Blair is hoping to use the conference to rally wider European support for sanctions to punish Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic for last week's crackdown in Kosovo. The penalties already have received the backing of the United States, Britain, France, Russia, Germany and Italy.

Strong advice on sex sparks call for dismissal

CHRISTCHURCH, New Zealand – A Methodist minister's advice to first-year university students not to let Christian tradition deter them from having sex has led to calls for his dismissal.

The Rev. David Bromell, the country's first openly gay Methodist minister, wrote in an orientation magazine for first-year students that "when a man and woman have sex, they're fulfilling the divine and human existence."

The Rev. Graham Capill, leader of New Zealand's morally conservative Christian Heritage Party, said the article undermined the clear teaching of Scriptures and urged Bromell's removal from his job as superintendent of the Christchurch Methodist Mission.

"It's more propaganda from the libertarian sector and more rubbishing of the Christian position," Capill said.

Bromell defended his position Wednesday, saying in a TV interview that the view of Christian conservatives that only moral sex was "between people in legal, heterosexual marriage" disenfranchised most people.

"Everyone who has never married, everyone who's separated, divorced, widowed – basically, 90 percent of the population," he said.

Capill said the article was on abstinence, and that sex was not something that should be dictated to young people by the church.

Church jury hears case on gay marriage

KEARNEY, Neb. – A Methodist minister who could be fired for performing a lesbian unity ceremony testified before a church jury Thursday that he was simply serving the couple's spiritual needs.

The Rev. Jimmy Creech, 53, pleaded innocent to charges that he held an unsanctioned liturgy and disobeyed United Methodist Church rules by conducting the ceremony.

The trial is the first challenge of the church's policy on homosexual ceremonies, Methodist officials said. They said the trial's outcome could shape how the church interprets its stance on homosexuals.

Creech, a senior pastor at First United Methodist Church in Omaha before being suspended Nov. 10, testified that he takes the church's liturgy seriously, but his main calling is to serve his local church and its members.

The trial is scheduled to end Friday with a verdict expected by the end of the day. If found guilty, Creech could be stripped of his ministerial credentials.

Ship carrying nuclear waste allowed to dock

TOKYO – A ship carrying 30 tons of nuclear waste will be permitted to dock to prevent its crew from being stranded in rough seas, but it won't be allowed to unload its cargo, a local governor said Thursday.

The British-flagged Pacific Swan had been scheduled to dock Tuesday with waste to be stored in this quiet seaside village, 325 miles northeast of Tokyo. The spent nuclear fuel is from Japanese nuclear power plants and was processed in France for disposal. Gov. Morio Kimura has insisted that no more waste can be dumped in the village of Rokkasho until the government provides assurances that a permanent storage site will be built elsewhere.

However, Kimura was asked to allow the ship to enter port so its 26 crew members could rest and escape the rough seas expected off the port Friday, said Shigehiro Itoh, a spokesman for Japan Nuclear Fuel Ltd., which is responsible for receiving the waste.

Nuclear officials say the shipments are safe. Activists argue that Rokkasho is a dangerous place for storage because it sits on at least two active earthquake faults.

Bilingual education bears brunt of court's decision

POLICY: Districts decide on how to teach students of limited English skill

By Ann Bancroft
The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO – In a decision giving local school districts control over bilingual education, the State Board of Education on Thursday rescinded a decade-old policy requiring that students with limited English skills be taught in their native language.

The surprise move, labeled a "terrible mistake" by advocates for bilingual education, came in response to a petition filed with the board by the conservative Pacific Legal Foundation.

"This puts the wheels in motion to set a new direction for ... meeting the needs of English-language learners," said Bill Lucia, the board's executive director.

In June, California voters will consider Proposition 227, a ballot initiative that would end most bilingual education. It would require students to be taught "overwhelmingly" in English. A spokeswoman for the initiative praised the board's action.

"It is encouraging for the campaign because it confirms what we've been saying all along – that it's absurd that a law that expired 11 years ago continues to be mandated throughout the state," Spokeswoman Sheri Annis said.

The Pacific Legal Foundation asked the board on Feb. 17 to withdraw all written policies that led districts to believe primary language instruction is required for "limited, English-proficient" students.

The foundation argued that because the state's bilingual education law expired in 1987, the board was acting beyond the scope of law when it required districts to obtain permission for English-only programs.

Board members also relied on a ruling by a Sacramento judge, issued last week in a separate court case. In that case, Spanish-speaking parents sought to require the Orange Unified School District to continue primary language instruction for 1,400 first-through third-graders.

Parents and bilingual education advocates argued that children were being denied equal-education opportunities and that the state Board of Education was wrong to allow the Orange County district to conduct an English-only program.

Sacramento Superior Court Judge Ronald Robie ruled last Friday that the board was acting "contrary to law" in issuing any such waivers.

Robie said primary-language

Future leaders visit Silicon Valley

EXCHANGE: Cooperation between nations results in technological tours

By Catalina Ortiz
The Associated Press

SUNNYVALE, Calif. – The possible future leaders of the United States and Russia visited Silicon Valley on Thursday as part of their effort to further cooperation between their countries.

Vice President Al Gore and Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin toured a commercial satellite facility and were to meet with several high-tech executives.

"We're shifting our focus from warheads to the World Wide Web," Gore said Thursday.

The two came to the Silicon Valley from Washington, where they held their 10th semiannual meeting to further cooperation between Russia and the United States.

"We have worked for five years to remove the obstacles to cooperation, and now we see with our own eyes the fruits of collaboration of some of the brightest minds in the United States with the brightest minds in Russia," Gore said.

Gore – expected to seek the Democratic nomination for president in 2000 – and Chernomyrdin – considered a possible successor to Russian President Boris Yeltsin – also have been exchanging industrial tours.

In September, Chernomyrdin took Gore on a visit to Samara, an industrial city on the Volga, where more than 20 U.S. companies have operations.

Gore called Samara an economic model for the rest of Russia as it remakes itself following the breakup of the former Soviet Union.

The previous February, Gore and Chernomyrdin attended the Chicago Auto Show and met with Midwestern business executives.

The Russian prime minister asked for better understanding of his country and the challenges it faces.

On Thursday, Gore and Chernomyrdin visited Lockheed Missiles & Space, a defense contractor in Sunnyvale that has been giving greater emphasis to commercial ventures since the end of the cold war. The company already does business in Russia, including a joint venture to put satellites into space.

and other industries.

Other graduates practice in various areas within the law or related to law. Some even practice in accounting firms, which have recently started recruiting students out of law school.

These divisions are rather arbitrary and reflect the market, according to Mallow. They are similar to those in other top law schools.

"It's hard to assess the division of students," Mallow said. "There are people in private practice who work pro bono," she said, emphasizing that not all public interest work that attorneys do falls into the percentages compiled by the law school.

Other people go to law school by default.

Beth Kraemer, a third-year law student, ended up in law school because the clock was ticking.

"I intended to apply, and my LSAT score was expiring. I didn't want to take it again," she said.

Kraemer plans to work in employment litigation with a corporate firm after graduates.

Azadeh Allayee, who now enjoys law school, is another student who ended up in law school by default. She decided to attend because she wanted to continue her education but did not know where she should go.

"I wasn't exactly sure why I was going to law school," said Allayee, a second-year law student.

"I knew I didn't want to go to grad school or to med school. I guess I liked it because I was an English major, and you do a lot of writing in law school," she said.

Mallow and Mayorkas counsel students who go to law school by default.

"We try to present different options and start them in the right direction," Mallow said. They have seen success stories of law students who end up at law school for all different reasons.

"There are large demands for scientists and engineers in intellectual property law," Mallow said.

"Everyone has different backgrounds. That's what makes law school so interesting," she said.

instruction is required "when necessary" to meet the educational needs of a student. But he said the board had no authority to require districts to offer any specific type of program for students who speak little or no English.

The Department of Education, which audits school districts for their compliance with bilingual education policies, disagreed with the board's interpretation of the court ruling.

Allan Keown, deputy general counsel to the department, said the board was on shaky legal ground if it agreed with the Pacific Legal Foundation petition, calling it a "gross mischaracterization" of the law.

But the board's own attorney, Rea Belisle, said Robie's ruling left little choice.

"I really resent being put in this position," said board member Kathryn Dronenburg. At the same time, she said, "I don't see how (the court ruling) could be any clearer."

Board member Janet Nicholas made the motion to rescind the current policy and direct staff members to draft a new policy giving more control to local boards.

prospective partners to join them and the United States in condemning Slovakian Prime Minister Vladimir Meciar for stopping investigations of his political allies.

Concern over Meciar's authoritarian style has hurt Slovakia's recent chances of EU membership.

The London conference is to become an annual event, designed to keep up the momentum of enlargement. Membership talks with the fast-track candidates will open March 30.

"It will take quite a number of years before these countries can join the union," said Dutch Prime Minister Wim Kok.

Turkey boycotted the summit, miffed at its rejection as a candidate. The EU planned today's summit to show Ankara that while an offer of EU membership for Turkey is not imminent, it wants to keep the country close to the family of European nations.

Ankara hasn't been mollified by the gesture and insists on EU membership or nothing. The EU has rejected Turkey's membership, saying Ankara is not ready politically or economically and still had serious human rights problems.

Cook did not view Turkey's boycott of the summit as a snub.

"They have chosen not to come (and) that is not something that is going to interfere with the usefulness and value of the conference," he told reporters on the summit's eve.

Ankara acknowledges that it cannot meet all membership criteria but says it sees the rejection by what it calls an overwhelmingly Christian club as stemming more from Islam and immigration than economics and politics.

Last week, Turkish Prime Minister Mesut Yilmaz accused Germany of using EU enlargement to expand its sphere of interests eastward while keeping Turkey at bay. He used the Nazi term "Lebensraum," or "living space," which the German government found crude.

The EU has also decided to open membership talks with the Greek part of Cyprus.

CABLE CAR

The mayor of Cavalese said "it isn't true that the U.S.A. wanted to close this with a note of reprimand ... They want to punish those responsible."

The board looked at many factors, but concluded that just one thing caused the tragedy: the crew's decision to fly lower than the authorized 1,000 feet and to exceed the authorized speed of 450 nautical miles an hour by 100 nautical miles an hour.

Even more damning, the board concluded, "the cable strike was not a one-time altitude miscalculation."

During the fatal flight, DeLong said "the crew flew lower and faster whenever the terrain permitted, in other words, whenever there was a valley."

Questions arose whether the crew was "hot-dogging," – flying risky maneuvers.

DeLong said witnesses on the ground said the Prowler was flying "aggressive" maneuvers. "That's all we have. That was their words," he said.

The crew refused – on advice of their lawyers – to talk to the board. "I have no idea what was in their minds," DeLong said.

But, DeLong added, the board found no evidence of a pattern that fliers out of Aviano, one of the biggest U.S. air bases in Europe, routinely ignore flight rules.

In written statements to the board, the crew denied they were "flat-hatting" – military slang for violating altitude restrictions.

The case is now in the hands of Lt. Gen. Peter Pace, commander of U.S. Marines Forces Atlantic.

In a statement, Pace said that if the U.S. maintains jurisdiction, he will convene the military equivalent of a grand jury to consider charges such as negligent homicide, involuntary manslaughter, dereliction of duty and property damage.

Pace said other officers at Aviano could face administrative sanctions for not informing the crew that Italian regulations in place since August limit low-level flights in the area to 2,000 feet, not 1,000 feet.

He also said the United States should pay all "proper" claims for death and damage resulting from the tragedy. Bacon, the Pentagon spokesman, said the U.S. offered each family $5,000 for burial expenses and has not ruled out further claims.

The plane was piloted by Capt. Richard J. Ashby, 31, of Mission Viejo, Calif. The other crew members were Capt. Joseph P. Schweitzer, 30, of Westbury, N.Y., Capt. Chandler P. Seagraves, 28, of Ninevah, Ind., and Capt. William L. Raney II, 26, of Englewood, Colo.

Their squadron was on a six-month assignment to Aviano from the Marine Air Station at Cherry Point, N.C. Most of its 300 flights during the tour were over Bosnia as part of an international peacekeeping mission. Only 11 were low-level training flights.

LAPD: Crime prevention policy makes lawlessness a self-fulfilling prophecy

Garrick Ruiz

First off, I'd like to recount an incident that happened to me about a month and a half ago. I had gotten off work at 11 p.m. on a Sunday (Super Bowl Sunday, to be exact) and a co-worker was giving me a ride home. We exited the 10 Freeway at Overland near my house. As we were exiting, we saw a police car pulling someone over. As we got off, they pulled over and as we drove by we noticed that four young African American males were seated inside. Aware that the LAPD has gained quite a reputation of mishandling people of color, we slowed and watched what was about to transpire.

We stopped at a gas station and sat in the car watching for a while. I can only describe what we saw from a distance of about 100 hundred feet because we weren't really sure what the legal minimum distance away was, so we played it safe and kept a pretty good distance. Nothing happened for a good 10 minutes or so while the cops waited for another car to come.

Once there were four officers, each of the four seated in the car had to get out of the car separately. They were then searched and told to sit on the curb. After all four people were out of the car, they checked everyone's IDs and then had them sit out there while the cops searched the entire car. This took a long time, as the one cop who searched the car was very thorough. He looked everywhere – inside the car, in the trunk and under the hood. Apparently they did find a bottle of champagne. However, the bottle was unopened, as we heard the pop when the officer opened it to pour it out.

This seems wrong to me as I don't think it is against the law to have a closed container of alcohol in your car.

After all of this was done they still held them for several more minutes. I assume they were saying things to them, probably threatening them. Finally they were free to go at around midnight. These innocent people had been held for no reason for an hour.

The worst part of this whole episode was revealed afterward, after they came up and we talked to them for a couple of seconds. My friend and I were extremely pissed off that the cops had done this. An hour of their lives had been taken from them for no reason.

> Don't just look the other way when you see helpless people being harassed by cops.

The horrible thing was that they weren't even mad, or at least didn't seem so. This was an everyday thing to them. They basically told us that it wasn't a good thing but it happens all the time and there is nothing to be done about it. This was the most demoralizing thing.

Of course, officers often do subject some to such random, unjustified searches. But it doesn't happen to everyone. I'm lucky. I look white.

Strangely enough, I haven't ever been pulled over in such a case – but after talking to those people, it seemed quite obvious that the people who tend to get pulled over by the cops are not singled out because they have violated any law which is written in law books, but because they have committed the onerous sin of having black or brown skin in a land which is dominated by those with fairer skin.

It's strange how the number of cops gets larger and larger in the areas of this city where people of skin tones other than white have been forced to live by the economic policy of the land.

It's also strange how, in my experience, the vast majority of cops tend to be white. As long as we have a police force made up of white officers telling people of color what to do, it doesn't seem to me like there will be much success in preventing crime.

If you belonged to a community which has been oppressed by white people for centuries, if you still lived in poverty in East L.A. (or Compton or Long Beach or Watts) while nearly all of the people living in opulence in places like Beverly Hills and Bel-Air are white, would it make much sense to obey the guardians of this economic order, namely the police?

But putting that aside, we like to think that people try to do well for themselves and try not to commit crimes. However, it seems to be accepted logic that if you continuously tell a child that he is dumb then that kid is probably going to start believing it and eventually will end up fulfilling the adjective which had been placed on him. (This happens to be a nugget of conventional wisdom that I actually do agree with.) If this is true, why is it that Slackers. Techno junkies. Extreme. Apathetic. Twentysomething. These are some of the many labels used to describe Generation X. To many the concept of a generational identity is just as nebulous as the term Generation X. Is it fair to characterize a person or group of people based on when they were born? If so what can really be learned? Is Generation X a homogenous herd or a diverse mix?

GENERATION XPLOITED?

Contrary to popular belief, young people today aren't the only group to grow up with no apparent goals in life

By Dan S. Hong

Generation X ... this is a favorite topic among college students and pre-adolescent teenage rockers who think that the label is real cool due to the mere connotation which it implies: the pre-millennium generation defined by its lack of definition obfuscated by mainstream-consumer ideology and pigpen parameters. Yeah, well, I think it's all entirely hogwash.

Mainstream society's perspective on things must be ordered and comprehensible to adults and old farts who want to understand what the hell us kids are going through. So they conveniently give a name for each generation to round us up and stereotype us according to a set of characteristics that they either have imagined or gathered from their "expert" field agents collecting precious data on our world of subcultures.

To my knowledge, the term "Generation X" was fabricated by capitalistic whoremongers in the media who wanted to package our subculture into something that could be bought and sold at your local Tower Records or Nordstrom. I admit that our generation is not an exception in this deplorable nonsense. There's the Lost Generation of the early '20s and '30s, led by literary figures like Gertrude Stein, Ernest Hemingway and others who were quite disillusioned by the destructive consequences of the first World War. Then there's the Beat Generation characterized by all the beat hipsters like Jack Kerouac, Allen Ginsberg, William Burroughs and countless others who wrote like maniacs heavily drugged and out-of-focus.

There are the constantly misconstrued anti-war hippies of the '70s, and of course, the Baby Boomer generation which is responsible

Generalizing generations doesn't make sense

LABELS: Stereotyping misses the point that individuals can be very different from the group

By Paolo Bayless

As if it were not enough to be labeled by our race, gender, religion, hair color, etc., those of us born between baby booms have been recently labeled as members of the lost generation known as "X." With this label comes a vast number of generalizations, stereotypes and almost juvenile oversimplifications.

Anyone that believes that it is possible to speak about our entire generation as a whole obviously doesn't walk by the north side of Ackerman during lunchtime. You know where I'm talking about – that small section of the Bruin Walk which is such a mosaic of diversity that it makes the cantina scene in Star Wars look homogenized. Next time you pass by this vast tapestry of Generation X, try to find a single, unifying theme to the chaos that exists there. Of course, as with most things, there are no simple ways to categorize such a large group of individuals.

The reason that we try to name, label and define a generation is primarily because it seemingly simplifies things. It is quite a convenient shortcut to try to generalize a large group of people. This is why we are so quick to stereotype people by characteristics such as their physical appearance and their family background. Slowly, we have learned the errors of judging individuals solely on these factors. Isn't it just as pointless to judge a

The myopic view of race shown by Elias Serna in a recent Daily Bruin article ("State overlooks history in race to be colorblind," March 11) is shocking and pitiful. Serna states, "We have a more inclusive vision of society because our vision includes us, the 'historically underrepresented.'"

Yet, by the very article that these words were printed in, Serna is shown to be one of the most divisive and prejudiced persons I have ever known of! Serna seems to think that there is some type of "white ruling class" that goes out of its way to oppress "persons of color" (which seems to include everyone of various skin pigments – except for whites).

This is decisional. There is no white conspiracy, and propositions 187, 209 and 227 are not tools of oppression. Namely, Proposition 209 does not refer to "racial history" because it does not have the myopic view of Serna, but rather expressed timeless principles of equal treatment under the law. These propositions do not attack "persons of color." They are breaking down those race-based programs and laws that are used by demagogic individuals for their own power grab. No, Elias, there is no white conspiracy out to get you or "persons of color," and I urge you to look beyond your race-obsessed ideas.

we aren't doing anything about police constantly being suspicious of people based on their physical appearances? If you consistently tell kids that you think they are doing something illegal, if this is what you expect them to do, then that expectation will probably eventually be fulfilled.

And of course I haven't even touched on the issue of police brutality. This issue in itself is deserving of much more than a single column, much less one part of a column. The number of people who have been murdered by the police in this country in the past few years is quite astounding. The Stolen Lives Project has been attempting over the last couple of years to catalog as many of these cases as possible. There are simply hundreds and hundreds of cases. The number of people who have been abused and not killed is obviously much higher and also astounding. The few cases which have gotten widespread media attention are horrendous, but these are not the only times that this sort of thing goes on.

So I guess the point of all of this is don't accept what someone says or tells you to do just because they have a badge. You might want to pay more attention to them for another reason, however – the fact that they carry guns.

But despite this vulgar display of brute force, there are ways to resist. Know the law, do anything you can do legally to resist them. Also, watch out for each other. Don't just look the other way when you see helpless people being harassed by cops. Always make them accountable for what they do. Let them know that if they are going to be brutal, you will be there to witness it. Get involved with groups that are out there exposing what police do and fighting for change.

I once had a professor who said it was stupid to fight against the cops because that was like fighting against overseers during the time of slavery. In other words, the cops aren't the ones who create the system, they don't have real power, they are just the enforcers of a system created by others. This is very true and I do believe that cops are often just dupes who follow orders. However, my question is: Was it wrong for slaves to fight back against the overseers even if possibly they weren't the orchestrators of the whole thing? By my way of thinking they may not be the only ones who are guilty, but they still have a lot of blood on their hands.

So, now we're here in this decade of the most technologically advanced age in all of human history. Enter the final stage of the progression of us twentysomethings and atomic teenage kids. Now we're mindlessly bopping to the electro-sounds of techno and gangsta rap, both of which are completely bland watered-down trash, picked and assorted for the popular flavors of popular youth consumerism. All of this is great and all, but the bulk of the emphasis on these ideas was nurtured and cared for by billion dollar corporations in the music, film and TV industries, not to mention all the countless others that blossomed like ugly spores on the purity of the underground sound.

The diehard and hardcore underground believers were the only ones who effectively channeled the true energy of the scenes' ideas into positive actuality.

I know I'm coming off as an ultra-elitist waving the banner of hardcore for all of the categorical movements out there and under here from punk-rock bopsters to hip-hop b-boyz, but that was the true unspoken credo of all those who believed to help themselves and/or to help others. Purists such as us who, like the bebop headz of the '50s and '60s jazz scene, want only to purify and expand our constructed subculture societies to bring together those who were like us to coordinate some kind of community where we could come to escape the mindless destruction that mass-consumer culture had drenched our Big Brother society with. We are not here to set trends or to produce the next Puff Daddy. We're just trying to stay alive in this ideological wasteland of broken lights.

group of people based solely on their generation?

Another reason for you to buy into my theory is provided by the fact that our generation seems destined to be remembered in a less-than-admirable light.

In other words, does the term "slacker" ring a bell? Popular opinion of our generation seems to indicate that we are all pale, scruffy, David Spade/Courtney Love lookalikes with a twisted "Fiona Apple acceptance speech" outlook on life. We are believed to treat coffee not as a beverage, but as a way of life, and participate in sports only if they have the adjective "extreme" preceding them. Now I cannot speak for everyone, but I don't really want to be remembered in quite this way. Contrary to popular belief, I don't spend my weekends riding around in my Volkswagen in search of abandoned furniture.

In addition, I don't think that it is possible to characterize people into these specific time periods. Do you really think that at the stroke of midnight on Dec. 31, 1979 every American's heart instantly filled with greed and self-interest? Sure, this notion sounds laughable in this context, but we are all aware of the various stereotypes concerning the decades of the 20th century.

It is not the case that I am without historical consciousness. I just believe that the generalizations being tossed around about Generation X are not universally valid, and therefore, not very useful. Moreover, I think that we would all be better off if we spent less time concerned with the underlying theme of our generation, and more time focused on ourselves as individuals.

A blockbuster night

Awards show lets fans vote for favorite celebrities

By Aimee Phan
Daily Bruin Staff

For the last month, Hollywood has been in the thick of awards season, dishing out honors to anybody and everybody who's done a movie in anticipation of the mama of all awards, the Oscars. On Tuesday night, the celebrities came out for the Blockbuster Entertainment Awards, where members of the mega-chain video and music stores voted for their favorite movies, actors and musicians of the year.

What makes the Blockbuster Awards different from, say, the Golden Globes or the Grammy Awards, is that not the usual critically lauded films and musicians are honored. This is an unabashed popularity contest more like the People's Choice Awards, and the actors who attended the event appreciated the difference.

Julia Roberts, who took home two trophies, for Favorite Actress in a Comedy ("My Best Friend's Wedding") and Favorite Actress in a Suspense ("Conspiracy Theory"), said that these awards are particularly gratifying because they come from true fan support.

"(Although) it's nice when your peers give you something because they understand exactly what you go through, for people who simply go and watch the result and appreciate it, there's something really tremendous about that," Roberts said.

Will Smith, another double-time winner for Favorite Actor in a Science Fiction movie and Favorite Soundtrack ("Men in Black"), adds, "What's great about this award is the fans actually vote. They take time out of their day to send in a ballot or get on the internet to vote for you. This is like the raw, uncut truth."

The celebrities arrived at the Pantages Theatre amidst screaming, manic fans and even louder and more manic photographers, who pushed and shoved their way into getting the best shot of the actors and musicians who strolled down the red carpet. The ceremony started promptly at 5 p.m. where it was broadcast live for the East Coast.

A wide range of famous personalities, from ice skater Michelle Kwan to Howard Stern, graced the stage either by presenting or receiving a Blockbuster trophy. The show also featured live performances by Boyz II Men, Savage Garden, Garth Brooks and Mariah Carey.

The evening was also marked with sadness as the news of 85-year-old veteran actor Lloyd Bridges' death filtered to the stunned and grieved celebrities, who all paid their condolences to the family. Among the actors who expressed their sadness over the loss was Filmmaker Award recipient Robert Duvall.

Movie fans voted Will Smith as favorite actor in the science-fiction category.

"He was a lovely man," Duvall said. "I knew him fairly well. He was a wonderful member of the film community and a wonderful guy. My feelings go out to the family."

Added presenter Joan Cusack, "I just feel so sad. I'm actually working on a movie with Jeff Bridges, so I feel so terrible for him. It must be very very hard."

After the winners gave their acceptance speeches, they were shuttled off to the photographers and press tents where they answered questions from reporters and posed adoringly with their trophies.

Linda Hamilton, who won the Best-Actress-in-an-Action-Adventure award for "Dante's Peak" joked about the hectic pace of the past few weeks with all the awards shows that she and her husband, director James Cameron of "Titanic," have been going to.

"I think we cannot wait until this is over," Hamilton said. "It's amazing the level of stress that comes with all of this. No matter what he says about not thinking about it all the time, it is a tremendous ordeal to be on top of your game. I can't wait until we get to just put this all behind us and go away and do something real."

Get thee to The Abbey, Hollywood's hippest cafe

RESTAURANT: Soothing atmosphere, astounding food makes for a memorable dining, drinking experience

By Vanessa VanderZanden
Daily Bruin Staff

A slight breeze rustles the leaves of the surrounding plants. Water trickles from the outdoor fountain. And though cars rumble by the West Hollywood setting, they sound more like a calming Parisian bustle than an L.A. nuisance.

Where can such an idyllic environment be found this side of overpopulated, societal hell? At The Abbey, a cafe and restaurant at the corner of the Robertson and Santa Monica Boulevards, which caters largely, but not exclusively, to the gay community. Despite its congested location, the well-known, late-night hangout offers an oasis from the stresses of daytime grunt work.

Mostly an enlarged patio, the veranda-style grounds find separation from the street merely by a black, metal gate on wheels. The Abbey provides a relaxed atmosphere that feels like a settling European afternoon.

Plants strung with white lights creep out of the walls, working aesthetically with the umbrellaed tables. These sanctuaries from the sun provide the perfect ambience for individuals to get in some afternoon reading over a latté or capuccino. The young, well-dressed crowd gives off a content, self-assured glow that offers its own sort of relaxation.

AARON HAND/Daily Bruin

Amidst this peaceful arena, the slight aroma of fresh, ground coffee beans mingles with the soothing melodies of Enya or classical piano concertos. The source of these enchantments reside just beyond the open seating area.

Though the interior portion seems to consist mostly of a bakery counter and chalkboard of food specials, huge vintage chandeliers and a mosaic manage serve as decor.

However, the glass case of sweets is all anyone within this nook will notice. It features humongous tortes, cakes and goodies spilling over three tiers. From the chocolate and vanilla-swirled buttercream tuxedo cake, to a macadamia-nut, coconut, pecan-filling based torte and a 6-inch, chocolate shaving-covered meringue to a decadent, chocolate-layered Snickers cheesecake, one can't go wrong. Even the vast array of bunt cakes, coffeecakes, and individual-sized mousses and cobblers look like something from the pages of Bon Appetit, worth every cent of the just-under $5 cost of most desserts.

To complement these rich concoctions, The Abbey offers an entire list of espresso drinks for a couple of bucks a piece. Made with care and precision, these jolting brews bite in a satisfying way that even the least of Starbuckian cafes would be want to emulate. They also offer a variety of their very own expresso creations, like the holy cow ($2.90), a fiendishly sweet blend of hazelnut syrup, thick chocolate sauce, cream and espresso over ice.

However, the beverage offerings continue from there. Smoothies, espresso shakes and a full range of imported beers coexist with all sorts of teas and juice. Even wine finds a home here, which offers a nice complement to the variety of gourmet food options.

The menu includes sandwiches ranging from the Ahi tuna, to the steak, to the grilled chicken breast dressed with Dijon mustard, all served with either a potato and vegetable side or the equivalent ($6 to $8). Within the same price bracket, numerous salads span from the standard Caesar combinations and Chinese-chicken sort to the more aristocratic varieties.

A splendid example comes in the warm salad ($8.50), which combines fresh, baby greens with sun-dried tomatoes, chunks of seasoned baked chicken, goat cheese and plump, ripe tomatoes under a subtilely flavored vinaigrette. At once light and refreshing, the dish is filling but still leaves room to gorge on dessert.

Still, the cafe provides more than just sandwich and salad options or even their soup of the day. Dinner entrees include such treats as turkey chili, quesadillas and an entire selection of pastas. The classy variety includes a seafood option, with fresh mussels, revealing The Abbey to be a lot more than merely an outdoor cafe.

The establishment even provides a full breakfast menu. Just the thought of sipping freshly-brewed coffee over a sizzling omelet under the bright sunshine would be enough to entice anyone to scream, "Carpe Diem!"

Yet most of The Abbey's business is done once the shows get out and people refuse to go home. As the crowd shifts into a state of wee-hour revelry, the gates of the restaurant burst in an attempt to contain the mass of hip individuals. Catering to this bustling element, The Abbey only serves those 21 and over after 8 p.m., attaching a one-drink minimum.

Whatever the time of day, The Abbey has the capacity to accommodate its customers. With a friendly, dedicated staff, the soothing cafe offers an oasis from the events outside of its metal gates. Sort of like a monastery of Medieval Europe. Sort of like, well, a modern-day abbey.

Sandra Ng stars in "Four Faces of Eve."

"Four Faces of Eve"
Directed by KI Kam, Jan Lamb and Eric Kot
Starring Sandra Ng

In the tragicomic "Four Faces of Eve," a daring, fervid and intoxicatingly melodic announcement of what visionary cinema can achieve, popular Hong Kong actress Sandra Ng ("Young and Dangerous IV") has four different faces in four different short stories, each one touching a separate contour of the female complexion: rough, smooth, dry and, around the softest areas, wet with the sting of salt.

The first story is about a prostitute who has fallen in love with her therapist. With quick, violent cuts we see her crying in horrific agony from the sexual pummeling of one particular client; we assume that degradation is the cause for her neurosis. However, we later find out that she enjoys the pain, and that one of her problems is that she can't find enough men who can make her cry. As we see more of this strange woman at work, the story reveals a kind of grungy sophistication in its perception about certain women, giving us a clue (some will find it a warning) that the rest of the film won't be serving up the typical platitudes about Mother-Courage righteousness.

The movie moves forward to a delightfully absurd piffle about a domestic slave; her wretched life revolves around her abusive husband, his crazed mistress, their children and her mother-in-law. It's a profanely corrupt throwback to the screwball comedies of the silent era – hardly any dialogue is spoken, though you'll dig the songs, including a Chinese version of "Moon River" that will inexplicably bring tears to your eyes.

The filmmakers saved their best for third, called "Twins." It's about a woman who, as a child, didn't want to dress like her twin sister, and so she started dressing like a boy. As an adult, she dresses like a man and is totally estranged from her sister, who is terminally ill. One night while visiting her sister, who has been bed-ridden for years, she gets drunk and puts on a sexy red dress with lipstick to match. Then something wonderful happens, in a sequence that's sentimental but dreamily so. She will never see her sister again. The tale is an absolutely hypnotic experience, mostly due to the disarmingly visceral patchwork of famed cinematographer Christopher Doyle ("Temptress Moon" and "Chunking Express").

The last installment, where a couple is put on a wicked game show to testify to their love, is the least impressive: it's a bit snide and bitter for all the romping it does. But it has the funniest bit in the entire movie (the woman recalls her first romantic meeting with her husband as him stalking her and then shooting her to bits in sublime, comic slow-mo). And the last story has an unforgettable last frame of Ng's face, an insanely gorgeous, and sad, farewell for a movie that, surprisingly, (considering all the wild experimentations it imposes) rarely ever wears out its welcome.

"Four Faces of Eve," unfortunately, only plays for one week, at Laemmle's Grand in Downtown Los Angeles.

"The Man In the Iron Mask"
Directed by Randall Wallace
Starring Gabriel Byrne, Gérard Depardieu, Leonardo DiCaprio, Jeremy Irons and John Malkovich

Through the success of his Oscar-nominated script for "Braveheart," Randall Wallace won the opportunity to direct such a fine ensemble of actors in "The Man in the Iron Mask." But his obvious skill for creating epic heroes does not translate well into this hokey, light-hearted treatment of the Dumas classic.

Wallace's directorial debut documents the last chapter of the Three Musketeers legend. The trio attempts to rescue a masked prisoner from the Bastille in the hopes of overthrowing a tyrannical king. They are aided by D'Artagnan, played excellently by Gabriel Byrne – the king's aide – whose internal struggle between duty and conscience eventually makes him a hero. Unfortunately, he is the only character the audience actually cares about.

While musketeers Jeremy Irons, John Malkovich and Gérard Depardieu play well off each other, the viewer never believes in their characters. Their interaction resembles a forced three stooges routine, except it's not funny. The only thing more ridiculous is their obvious inability to sword-fight. But this creates an unintended comedy that becomes the highlight of this Leonardo DiCaprio teenage-girl-lust spectacle.

In playing twin brothers, King Louis XIV and his masked brother Philippe, DiCaprio proves that his weak performance in "Titanic" was not a fluke. The youngest and most recent addition to the $20-million club was unconvincing in his dual roles, making it twice as painful for the viewer. Lines such as "I am a young king, but I am still king," echo the "Titanic" groaner, "I'm the king of the world."

Here are some hints for Leo: find a better script, stop pretending that you're the king of the world and return to your acting roots. For your next acting part, play a psychologically complex character like Arnie Grape from "What's Eating Gilbert Grape" – the only character you have ever done that has truly displayed your talent.

Though "The Man in the Iron Mask" proves that great actors can't save a terrible script, the film will still pull in the bucks. But with lavish visuals, a soaring score and the leading man of the next millennium, "Iron Mask" will most likely knock off DiCaprio's unsinkable "Titanic" from the No. 1 box office spot for the first time.

Take the soap opera challenge; Fall in love with beautiful people, twisty plots

COLUMN: 'General Hospital' has worlds of class, good taste and sensitivity you may not expect

I love soap operas. Really. I think they are one of the closest things to art television has that we have around. I think almost as long as these shows have been on for scads of years, entertaining us with their tawdry sex lives, multiple marriages and murderous escapades — all in and out and only taking a well-deserved break for the weekends and special holidays.

It is indeed the ultimate escape. We love to watch these pretty people manipulate and deceive others and while we sure wouldn't want their lives, we don't mind watching them screw up theirs.

Everyone has their favorite sud. For most people on this campus, it's either the mother of all cheesy melodramas, "Days of Our Lives" or my own personal favorite, the classy and heart-wrenching "General Hospital."

If you read the main story on this page, you will realize that I wrote it and yes, it is about "General Hospital." So I'm biased. Wild thing.

In their upcoming movie "Wild Things" Neve Campbell, Kevin Bacon, Matt Dillon and Denise Richards are doing some pretty wild things. Fraught with plot twists, the film is full of back-stabbing and surprise. We thought the actor should look the part, so go ahead and dress up these paper dolls as wildly as possible. Note to the average Bruin: wild does not equal naked. Turn your entries into Kerckoff 118 and winners will win free passes to the film as well as "Wild" stuff.

SECOND EXPOSURE

'Sing! A Musical Journey' strikes flat chord

THEATER: Lack of insight, creative approach leaves audience without interest

By Vanessa VanderZanden
Daily Bruin Staff

This play, what is it? You say you don't know. I think you know; you just don't say.

Well, it is "a musical journey" called "Sing!" starring Howard Hersh Felder running through this weekend at UCLA's Freud Theater. Felder plays the piano a lot and enacts a variety of Jewish stereotypes to express his own coming to grips with the Holocaust. Though he displays his musical talent, he enacts a script which feels so familiar as to be cliché.

By this day and age, most everybody can (hopefully) be said to understand the reality of the Jewish condition under Nazi Germany. Numerous plays, films, songs, musicals and dance numbers have gone into full detail on the subject. In order to grab audiences in a new way concerning the topic, one would have to reveal undiscovered terrain in relation to these themes.

"Schindler's List," which Felder helped Steven Spielberg research, truly grips crowds in the stark display of human suffering and the psyches of practically sadistic military leaders. However, Felder's interpretation of the era strikes no new chord. Yet, by intermingling piano music with his tales, he achieves a certain form of artistic solidarity which is not without entertainment value.

But he never breaks out of popular tunes long enough to instigate more than a blasé reaction. While he performs Rachmaninoff's famous Prelude No. 1 in C sharp and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," he fails to include original or lesser known works which could possibly grab crowds in a new way. By sticking to tried and true expressions of his inherited pain, the intensity of the subject matter feels lessened.

Still, the piano music does provide a nice interlude between acting bits. And Felder does capture audiences through his storytelling capacities. People seem truly intrigued by what he has to say.

Though Felder's performance evokes a few laughs and sighs of despair, nothing captures the audience for long. They have seen the examples of people re-visiting Auschwitz and they have heard the humorous tales of superficial Bar Mitzvahs.

If only Felder could use his ivory-tinkling capacities to create new visions or touch on new aspects of previously undiscussed themes, he could become a success. Mostly, crowds just tuned out and let their minds wander, while he over-zealously asks for applause.

Because, yes, the one-man show seems unable to leave the stage when the congratulatory part of the musical took over. He seems to linger, waiting to leave until the audience grants him a standing ovation. He releases each devastating word melodramatically, like a drama queen.

In this way, his performance almost seems juvenile. Like a child asking to be congratulated, Felder appears very caught up in his own egocentric notion of a universe which revolves around him.

By giving off this vibe, he takes the tale away from being about the survivors of the Holocaust and uses it to his own ends. These ends include a means of furthering his career, expressing his own grief, and basically denouncing his own connection to the Holocaust. As he seems to practically over-act, there can be no true way to experience the tragic historical event without a degree of distance.

Sadly, this distancing leaves audiences unentranced by Felder's otherwise spellbinding capacity for tale-telling.

Though he sings his tale through storytelling and piano work, he fails to shed new light on an old topic. For this, Felder fails, and leaves audiences hungering for emotional fulfillment.

Garth Brooks, who took the honor of Favorite Male Country Artist, expressed modest gratitude for his award, which is proof of the loyalty of his long-devoted fans.

"I think the awards are more meaningful because the longer you're in this business, the less of these you get," Brooks said. "So instead of becoming more blasé and taking them for-granted, they almost become more precious."

One of the few major highlights of the rather predictable show was when Howard Stern, the Best Male Newcomer, got distracted by presenter Heather Locklear and impulsively decided to make out with her on the stage instead of saying a thank-you speech.

"I just went up there and got carried away," Stern said. "I thought it was a great moment to be on top of Heather Locklear. I have no problem telling all of you that I was aroused while I was on top of her. The woman is exceptionally beautiful."

And while the winners were grateful for their prizes since they were given by the most valuable "critics," the people, Will Smith says that the opinion he values most is of his 5-year-old son, Trey.

"The best thing about my son is that he actually watches all the movies and listens to music," Smith said. "So his opinion is really important to me (because) he just tells the truth."

attack and rape several weeks ago. What makes this story so heart-breaking is the amazing scenes between her and her good friend (and possible future boyfriend) Lucky, who is helping her get over the trauma. This is the guy you want on your side for anything: he's sweet, understanding, empathetic and oh-so-good looking. And does this boy know how to cry! Every time the tears roll down that sweet little face of his, I want to yell to my roommates and ask them why there aren't more guys like Lucky.

Of course, they don't listen to me. Because while I like "General Hospital," my roommate is a "Days of Our Lives" fan. I've tried to give this show a chance, really I have, since there must be a reason why so many people love this show. But I just can't get over the really annoying fact that everybody on the show talks to themselves. Out loud and in public. Does anyone else realize how demented these people are? People don't talk to themselves, especially not in the long, melodramatic, plot-recapping soliloquies that these characters do. I just want an extra to walk up to one of these self-centered one-person conversationalists and say, "Would you please just shut up? Don't you realize how loud you're talking? And how you're revealing all your deep dark secrets to the open where just anyone can hear them?"

It's really sad that this NBC show is more popular than my other favorite soap (also on NBC), "Another World." Now while I do not watch that show consistently, I do think it's got one of the greatest couples ever, Jake and Vicky. They were childhood sweethearts and now they're married and living in a charming little cottage with her two young sons. Of course, they have their dysfunctions like everybody else. He used to be married to her twin sister Marley and she's still got a thing for a dead doctor who looked like Jethro from the "Beverly Hillbillies." And now Marley's coming back to town! Let the drama begin!

But as great as these soaps are, I do have one problem with them: Where the hell are the Asians? I am helpless to find one Asian person on a soap. Do they not exist? Are we not pretty or screwed up enough? I'll have you know I know many pretty screwed up Asians in the world and we deserve to have our place in soap operas. And please, do not make your token Asian character a doctor. There's no need to go reinforcing stereotypes, now, is there?

Exercise a little creativity and make her ... oh, a reporter ... from UCLA ... who wants to be a novelist. And if you're feeling particularly daring, introduce an Asian family into your lily-white scenery. It's not going to kill you, I promise. Ratings will not plummet. The American public is quite aware that Asians are out there so they're not going to be shocked if they see them on your show.

I understand that some of you out there might be a little wary about getting hooked on a soap. There's really no need. It doesn't require the commitment of watching five days a week to understand what's going on. The great thing about soaps is that the plots go at a snail's pace. So if you drop off for a month, you can tune right back in again, resting assured that very little has changed. I certainly don't watch my two soaps every day, but when I do tune in, I'm hardly ever lost. So take the soap opera challenge. Especially the overlooked but enchanting "Another World." You'll be glad you did.

any actor who works on a soap on a regular basis just gets really good at it."

Stuart Damon, who played Dr. Alan Quartermaine for more than 20 years, says that after spending so much time with the same character, the lines come much more easily.

"I know the lines pretty much because I know the character so well now," Damon says. "In the beginning, I used to cross the 't's and dot the 'i's, but I don't do that anymore. I kind of memorize ideas and all the operative words and quite often, I'll make up the linking material in between."

Another thing that makes memorizing lines easier is the actors' skill to ad-lib in a scene. When one accidentally forgets a line, quick thinking by other actors can often save a scene. Cerasoli quickly realized this clever technique during her early scenes with co-star Ingo Rademacher, who plays Jax.

"What I've come to realize, is if you don't say 'fuck' it's usually a keeper," Cerasoli laughs. "As long as we cover ourselves and don't end up swearing, they'll keep it if it looks good. Most of the work I've done is with Ingo, and I think we do a lot of our work in one take. It's not because we necessarily always get them right, it's because we cover each other. If you cover ... and the producer likes it, they'll take it."

Since soap storylines never have to end, sometimes the actors get curious about what the writers have in store for their characters: whether they're going to get a new love interest, commit a murder, or heaven forbid, be the one murdered (which means they've been fired from the show).

"I get bits of information," York says about his future storylines. "I guess if you're an actor and you're aggressive and you want to talk to people, you (can find out). Otherwise, there's not a lot of communication."

Damon, who is already established as a popular cornerstone character with the fans, says that while some actors might bug the writers about characters' fates, he prefers to be surprised by what the writers plan for him.

"I don't want to know what the writers have planned," Damon says. "I used to want to know when I was first on the show. Now I don't want to know because to me, it's more like real life. I like everything to take me by surprise so I treat it as something brand new."

Obviously, the writers must be doing something right due to the overwhelming popularity of the show. At the recent Soap Opera Digest Awards, the soap won in all the categories that it was nominated for, including Outstanding Show.

In trying to explain why the show has such a devoted following, York calls on the socially relevant topics that the show has touched upon. One example was the memorable AIDS storyline several years back in which York played a major part. In a well-written and sensitive storyline, York's character Mac watched his niece Robin deal with contracting HIV from her boyfriend Stone, who eventually died from an AIDS-related disease.

These kind of stories, York believes, help the audience learn more about a very real problem through characters they have grown to love and care about throughout the years.

"It makes people stop to think, just for a moment," York says. "Of course, we have to be careful not to set the example, like we're saying 'This is what you should think.' But you watch as a voyeur and decide either you agree with that or don't. It's feeding the conversation."

As for the future of the show's characters and their relationships, who knows? With the current track record of "General Hospital," it looks like audiences will be watching the Port Charles citizens live, love, cheat, steal and manipulate for a long long time.

"'GH' has been on for 35 years and why has it gone on? Because it's not over," York says. "The townspeople are still here, the town's still here. The story continues."

TV: "The General Hospital 35th Anniversary Show" will air Thurs. on ABC.

Q&A with the Daily Bruin takes a closer look at some of the issues and people shaping our lives.

Q&A with the Daily Bruin

WHERE THE LEGACY BEGAN

Coaching great John Wooden talks about his experiences, feelings and visions for college basketball

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

When the name "John Wooden" is spoken, one thinks of dominating basketball and an incomprehensible string of national championships.

He is known simply as the "Wizard of Westwood," and is widely considered to be the greatest basketball coach of all time.

Yet, he is so much more than a coach – he is also a writer, a teacher and a philosopher.

In a two-part interview, Coach Wooden shared his views on a wide spectrum of issues ranging from the changing state of college basketball to his lasting legacy at UCLA, as well as his inspiring secrets for success – both on and off the court.

Mr. Wooden, your coaching philosophy was very unique, and apparently a very successful, coaching philosophy. In a nutshell, can you tell UCLA exactly what that was?

First of all, I never talked to my players about winning in the general sense that most people consider winning. My whole philosophy is based on trying to get them to never think about their opponent, just think about themselves. I say never compare.

It is impossible to compare accurately and validly so just concentrate on improving yourself day by day. You do it in great leaps and bounds, but just try to do a little bit everyday and if you do that every day, just a little bit a little bit, and a little bit, it eventually adds up to a considerable amount.

My definition for success is peace of mind is achieved only by self-satisfaction of knowing that you made the best effort of which you are capable of. Everybody is equal in that respect – no one is better than you are in terms of making the best effort of which are capable of. We're not equal as far as size, or appearance or other ways, but we are all equal in terms of having the opportunity of making the best with what we have. That was my whole philosophy in trying to get that idea across.

Your pyramid of success is well-known around the UCLA campus and the college basketball community. Tell me, how did you develop it and do you still stand by it?

I do indeed stand by it, yes. I've never liked the idea that a person's success can be measured by the mark they make in the classroom, or the number of points they score in a basketball game. I think only the individual knows whether or not they made the effort of which they are capable.

I love poetry, and I had verse that said, "At God's footstool to confess a poor soul knelt and bowed his head, 'I failed he cried,' the master said 'Tho did thy best that is success.'"

That made an impression on me, and I thought about that when I coined my definition of success. But, my development of the pyramid resulted because some parents of some of my students in my English class – if they didn't get an A or B – thought either my students failed or that the teacher failed.

Now, not everyone can earn an 'A' or a 'B.' And I had youngsters who didn't get an A or a B who I thought did very well, maybe as well as some youngsters who received an A or a B. So then I began thinking of something, and I knew how they judge athletic teams – if you win them all, you are considered to be reasonably successful.

After coining the definition it didn't seem to be getting the desirable results that I had hoped for – either from myself individually or from those under my supervision – and I tried to analyze that and determine why, and I finally decid-

W. BASKETBALL: Janae Hubbard leads UCLA into Michigan matchup

By Chris Umpierre

Sue Guevara, Michigan women's basketball head coach, was looking at game film of the UCLA Bruins when something caught her eye.

The sight of Janae Hubbard and her 6-foot-4-inch, 245-pound frame backing down on opponents in the paint nearly made the Wolverine coach fall off of her chair.

"I think Robert Traylor has a sister, and her name is Janae Hubbard," Guevara said, referring to the Michigan's men's player who is 6-9 and 300 pounds. "She is a force under the basket just like Traylor. She likes to lean on you in the post. (The Bruins) are big, really big."

M. BASKETBALL: With memories of Princeton game in their heads, Bruins look to beat Miami Hurricanes

By Emmanuelle Ejercito
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

The sixth-seeded UCLA men's basketball team will travel to the Georgia Dome in Atlanta, hoping that they won't be blown away by a hurricane in the first round of the 1998 NCAA Tournament.

Though the Bruins (22-8) are considered the favorite in their South region match-up against the 11th-seeded University of Miami, UCLA is well aware of the potential for upsets, especially members of the senior class who had to endure the first-round loss to underdog Princeton in 1996.

"The game that we lost to Princeton, I think that we weren't into the game at all. I think that we were badly prepared for that game," senior J.R. Henderson said. "We took them lightly, thought it was going to be a breeze, then all of a sudden it's an upset.

"I think our team is very prepared this time, we know that there aren't going to be any easy games, so we just have to play hard and play every game like it is our last one."

And that is what they have done in their past two and a half games. UCLA has shown increased intensity and has played with high energy on both ends of the floor. Despite the fact that their record during those three games was 1-2, in the two

W. TRACK: UCLA's best hope strong performance will top last year's finish

By Alvin Cadman
Daily Bruin Contributor

As warm weather returns to Southern California, the UCLA women's track and field team will finish the indoor season by sending six athletes to the 1998 NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships, held in Indianapolis, Ind. The Bruins hope to improve on last year's seventh-place finish.

> "I am really looking forward to competing this weekend. We are all ready to hit a big throw."
> Seilala Sua
> Shot-putter

On Friday, the UCLA squad will showcase freshman standout Shakedia Jones. The 5-4 sprinter from Illinois will return to the Midwest as a double entry. She will compete in the 55-meter and 200-meter sprints.

She is currently ranked fourth in the nation in the 55-meter sprints with a time of 6.73 seconds. Jones' 200-meter time of 23.77 places her 16th on the NCAA qualifying list. She is also the defending back-to-back Junior Olympics women's 200-meter champion.

Rachelle Noble will compete in the 20-pound weight throw. She is ranked 12th on the collegiate charts, with a distance of 61-9. She won All-American honors in this event last season and is considered UCLA's most versatile thrower.

She is also double entered at the Indoor, competing in the weight throw and shot put. Noble is ranked 18th in the nation in the shot put, with a throw of 51-2.

On Saturday, redshirt freshman Erica Hoernig will compete in the pole vault final.

Her top vault of the season, 11-11, places her 13th on the NCAA qualifying list.

She competed at the 1996 U.S. Olympic Trials and is prepared to face a challenge at-the 1998 NCAA Indoors.

Sophomore Deana Simmons, ranked seventh in the nation with a 43-5 mark, which was third best in Bruin history. She will compete in the triple jump. Last summer she won the gold medal in the triple jump at the U.S. Junior and Pan American meets.

Finally, senior Nada Kawar and sophomore Seilala Sua will compete in the shot put, along with Noble. Kawar is No. 3 in the nation with a mark of 57-0 and is a two-time indoor All-American.

Meanwhile, Sua earned All-American honors last year in the indoor shot put as a true freshman. She also won the 1997 NCAA outdoor shot put title.

"I am really looking forward to competing this weekend. Practice has been going well for Nada, Rachelle and me.

"We are all ready to hit a big throw," said Sua.

The rest of the UCLA squad will compete at the Cal State Fullerton Invitational. Led by 1997 All-American juniors Andrea Anderson and Joanna Hayes, the Bruins hope to tune up for the Stanford Invitational in two weeks.

Anderson will compete in the 100 and 200-meter sprints, while Hayes will be entered in the 100 and 400-meter hurdles.

"The outlook for the outdoor season looks extremely good. Everyone is healthy and training very well. I think we all have a shot at going to nationals," said sophomore long and triple jumper Kelly O'Connor.

M. TRACK: Bruins send possibly the best squad ever to championships

By Donald Morrison
Daily Bruin Contributor

The UCLA men's track and field team will send a little bit of everything to the NCAA Indoor Championships at Indianapolis, Ind.

The Bruins are sending arguably their best team ever to the indoor nationals – and their most balanced.

"In general, I like the team," UCLA assistant coach Art Venegas said. "I like the fact that we have sprinters, jumpers, throwers, distance runners and a distance medley relay team. I think it's wonderful."

Leading the 11-member squad will be Mebrahtom Keflezighi. Keflezighi is the defending 5,000-meter indoor champion and is looking to repeat and garner his fifth NCAA individual championship.

Keflezighi will have to battle Brad and Brent Hauser from Stanford, as well as a sore tendon in his lower left leg. UCLA head coach Bob Larsen said Keflezighi could still pull off a victory.

"He's running stronger now than he did a few weeks ago but his speed isn't where it should be because we had to cut back on his workouts lately," Larsen said.

Scott Slover looks poised to claim a national title in the pole vault. Slover is currently tied with Texas' Jacob Davis for the best vault in the nation at 18 feet, 2 1/2 inches.

The distance-medley-relay team comes into the meet with the second best time in the country, but has to shift its lineup because of Keflezighi's minor injury.

Jess Strutzel will run the 1,200-meters, Damian Allen will run the 400-meters, Michael Granville will run the 800-meters and anchor, and Mark Hauser will do the 1,600-meters.

Hauser will also compete in the 3,000 meters and could place, Larsen believes, in the top eight.

Sprinters Jim McElroy and Damian Allen will try to do some damage to a tough sprinting field. McElroy will run the 55-meter dash, holding the 17th best mark in the country with a time of 6.17 seconds.

Allen will run the 200-meters and his time of 21.16 seconds is the 13th best time in the nation.

Senior Mel Moultry will make his first appearance at the indoor nationals, competing in the triple jump.

Travis Haynes and Wade Tift will both compete in the shot put. Haynes, a two-time All-American in the event, has the 10th best mark in the nation. Tift's mark of 61-0 1/4 is good enough for 13th.

Luke Sullivan will be the other thrower competing at nationals. Sullivan owns a mark of 66-9 3/4 in the 35-pound weight throw and hopes to improve on that this weekend.

UCLA ready to defend No. 1 rank vs. Stanford

WATER POLO: A victory over the Cardinal would lessen pain of loss to Cal

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Staff

Get this. In chronological order, Cal women's water polo team beat Stanford, UCLA beat Cal, Cal beat UCLA then Stanford beat Cal. So who's on top?

According to the latest poll, the Bruins are No. 1. They, however, want to make sure they stay No. 1 after they play the Cardinal on Saturday at the Sunset Recreation Center pool.

With a new head coach, Stanford women's water polo team (10-2) was thought to be going through a major adjusting period.

After having lost to Cal in the beginning of the season, Stanford has apparently adapted fast enough to redeem itself over the past weekend and raise its rank to No. 2.

The Bruins have yet to play the Cardinal this year. They have never lost to Stanford, and they're not about to either. Saturday's game finally provides the opportunity to see just how good the Cardinal is.

"Stanford has some very talented players," said UCLA head coach Guy Baker. "I thought they were going to improve as the season progressed, and they are."

While UCLA features a deep and talented squad that includes goalie Nicole Payne and playmaker Coralie Simmons, Stanford offers a challenge.

The Cardinal's main players include Ellen Estes and goalie Heather Crary.

Estes helped the Cardinal score seven points, while Crary let Cal have only two goals last weekend vs. Cal.

UCLA defender Mandy McAloon anticipates a challenging game.

"As a defender, it's going to be pretty difficult because they have a really good two-meter man and outside shooters," McAloon said. "They're a lot like us in that aspect so it's going to be pretty interesting."

"Stanford has always been one of the better teams," said team captain Payne, "but we have a good chance of beating them. We're especially excited because we play them at home. A lot of our family and friends are going to watch us play and hopefully, we'll win."

If history repeats itself, then the Bruins should continue their blemish-free record against the Cardinal.

Their first pairing of the season will finally put and end to the lingering question: Who's No. 1?

Following Saturday's match against Stanford, the Bruins will play a home game on Sunday against San Jose State at the Men's Gym pool.

San Jose State was beaten shamefully by the Bruins, and it hasn't improved enough to pose a threat. The challenge will be to play at a consistent level throughout the game after playing Stanford.

"It's going to be a big game with Stanford and the day after. The main thing we're going to do against San Jose State is ... (not) let down," Baker said.

It won't be the same this time around

VOLLEYBALL: Stanford's talented seniors left after last year's championship

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

To call it a rematch of enormous significance would be an overstatement.

When the UCLA men's volleyball team travels north to take on the Stanford Cardinal tonight, it will be a rematch of last year's national championship.

However, it probably won't look a lot like last year's match.

In the championship match, Stanford took a 2-0 lead before UCLA fought back to tie the match at two games a piece. In the final rally-scoring game, the Cardinal barely pulled out a 15-13 win.

But this year's Stanford squad is missing All-Americans Mike Lambert and Stewart Chong. The seventh-ranked Cardinal (10-4) has lost to Pepperdine, Loyola Marymount, USC and Penn State, all of which are schools that UCLA has beaten.

"They're an up and down team," UCLA head coach Al Scates said. "They can be like BYU. They can come out and play a great match like BYU did Friday. If they're not on, then we should, frankly, handle them very easily.

"But they're up and down, they have peaks and valleys and if they're on, they're very tough to beat. We don't really know which Stanford team is going to show up."

Although the Bruins (17-1, 11-1, Mountain Pacific Sports Federation) don't know which Stanford team will show up on the court, UCLA can be sure of its own offense.

Maple Leafs 2, Kings 1

Mike Johnson, the NHL's leading rookie scorer, scored a first-period goal and assisted on Fredrik Modin's third-period game-winner as the Toronto Maple Leafs defeated the Los Angeles Kings 2-1 Thursday night.

With the score tied at 1-1, Johnson intercepted Vladimir Tsyplakov's pass and passed to Mats Sundin. Modin took Sundin's pass between the circles and beat Kings goaltender Stephane Fiset with a slap shot for his 15th goal 4:26 into the third period.

Johnson's 12th goal tied the score 1-1 at 17:30 of the first period. Johnson, who has 38 points, took Steve Sullivan's pass and put a shot from the right circle past Fiset.

Johnson had an apparent goal nullified on Modin's interference penalty at 11:41 of the third period.

Toronto goaltender Felix Potvin made 28 saves.

Sabres 3, Sharks 1

Dominik Hasek stopped 38 shots and just missed a shutout as the Buffalo Sabres took advantage of an early goal in a 3-1 victory over the San Jose Sharks on Thursday night.

Michael Peca scored 24 seconds after the opening faceoff and the Sabres left the rest up to Hasek, who was 19 seconds away from his 10th shutout when John MacLean scored on a slap shot from the right circle.

Dixon Ward and Alexei Zhitnik also scored for Buffalo, which improved to 9-1-7 over its last 17 games. The Sabres had a 13-game unbeaten streak broken last week by the New York Islanders, Buffalo's only loss since Jan. 20.

Hasek, who led the Czech Republic to the gold medal in the Olympics, did not need to be spectacular in this one, but he was anyway. He improved to 10-3-6 while starting the Sabres' last 19 home games.

Lakers 108, Clippers 85

Shaquille O'Neal scored 32 points and Eddie Jones added 23 as the Los Angeles Lakers routed the Los Angeles Clippers 108-85 Thursday night.

Derek Fisher tied a career-high with 21 points and grabbed a career-high 11 rebounds in place of injured point guard Nick Van Exel.

Robert Horry had 14 rebounds for the Lakers, who entered the game with a league-leading 105.4 scoring average and inproved to 15-0 when shooting at least 50 percent from the field.

The Lakers were were no match for a Clippers squad that was coming off a 29-point loss at Phoenix and whose defense was the NBA's most generous at 104.3 points per game. Rodney Rogers led the Clippers with 16 points.

Spurs 97, Kings 86

David Robinson had his nose bloodied in the first quarter but returned to score 29 points, leading the San Antonio Spurs to a 97-86 victory over the Sacramento Kings on Thursday night.

Robinson was joined in double figures by Tim Duncan with 24 points and Jaren Jackson with 18. The Spurs, who won their third straight, completed a 4-0 sweep of the season series and clinched a playoff spot.

Sacramento was led by Mitch Richmond with 22 points and Corliss Williamson with 19.

Bruins can't watch major league alum start for Chicago White Sox

BASEBALL: With scheduling change, team must focus on its own game, matchup with Wildcats

By Kristina Wilcox
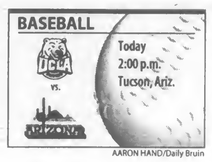
Daily Bruin Staff

The UCLA baseball team travels this weekend to Tucson for a three-game Six-Pac series vs. the University of Arizona.

This trip gives the team the opportunity to meet up with former Bruins who are participating in spring training with major-league teams.

"I'm going to have breakfast with Jake Meyer and Jim Parque," sports information director Jeff Blank said. Meyer, the closer for the 1997 Bruins, and Parque, also a pitcher, are now with the Chicago White Sox organization.



AARON HAND/Daily Bruin

The White Sox are scheduled to play the Anaheim Angels on Friday afternoon, a game that some current Bruins had hoped to watch until their own Friday game was moved up to 3 p.m. (2 p.m. Pacific). Parque, the rotation ace for UCLA last season, will be the starting pitcher for the White Sox in that game.

Funny, isn't former Bruin Troy Glaus playing for the Angels now?

That intriguing matchup between former teammates was canceled when Glaus got the ticket to the Angels' minor-league camp on Wednesday.

Oh well, guess it's time to worry about how the current Bruins (9-14, 4-7 in Six-Pac) will play against current No. 5 Wildcats (23-4, 5-4).

Right-handed freshman pitcher Chad Cislak is returning home this weekend. The Tucson native has improved of late for the Bruins, even though his record of 2-4 and 7.27 ERA does not reflect that. He will be Saturday's starting pitcher. He allowed seven runs (4 earned) in 5 2/3 innings in his last start.

Head coach Gary Adams will keep the same rotation that the team fielded last weekend against Arizona State.

Freshman left-hander Ryan Carter gets the nod for Friday's starting spot on the mound. He has been the most effective pitcher for the Bruins of late, going 1-0 with a 2.78 ERA on the year. Last weekend against the Sun Devils, he went seven innings, allowing only 6 hits and 5 runs, only one of them earned, while striking out eight batters.

Freshman right-hander Jon Brandt, first slotted as the team closer, has found his way into the starting rotation. He struggled late in his outing last weekend, but was very strong otherwise. He lasted 5 1/3 innings, allowing four earned runs (6 runs overall).

Adams is realistic about the challenge his young team has to face this weekend against the Wildcats.

"We've got our work cut out for us," Adams said. "They are an old, veteran team, mostly juniors and seniors."

UCLA leads the all-time series against Arizona, 108-90-1, and are 65-57 under Adams.

Sophomore left-hander Rob Henkel was scheduled to have elbow surgery on Tuesday morning, but the operation was postponed until spring break, giving him more time to prepare mentally for the procedure.

Arizona heat will demand best Bruins have to offer

M. TENNIS: Team fires up to face Wildcats and Sun Devils on their own turf

By Stephanie Chan
Daily Bruin Contributor

The heat. The altitude. Yes, the Arizona climate at its best. This weekend, the No. 10 UCLA men's tennis team will exchange picture-perfect Southern California weather for the extreme temperatures of Arizona to play Arizona and Arizona State.

"It's going to be boiling ... I expect a very tough game there," said Vince Allegre.

It will not only be boiling in temperature, but in intensity.

"It is tough to play down there because (of) the altitude, and those guys really fire up," said Matt Breen.

> "We're not as strong as we could possibly be. We have to be hungry, scraping, energetic."
> Billy Martin
> UCLA men's tennis head coach

Both of the Arizona schools will be looking to even out their win-loss record with the Bruins. When the Wildcats and Sun Devils played at the Los Angeles Tennis Center, they were both defeated, 6-1.

The point that Arizona State stole from the Bruins was the doubles point. Consistency is one area the Bruin doubles teams have been struggling with all year.

However, in the previous meetings, the Bruins dominated the singles matches. Jean-Noel Grinda, Allegre, Breen, Alex Decret and Brandon Kramer all emerged with two wins. Chris Sands split, defeating Arizona State's Casey Was and losing to Arizona's Pascal Salasca.

The Bruin lineup has been through reconstruction since playing the Arizona schools. Noah Newman has been inserted into the lineup for the injured Kramer. Injured Jason Cook will not be ready for this road trip.

"Without Jason Cook and Brandon Kramer, we're not as strong as we could possibly be," said UCLA head coach Billy Martin. "We have to be hungry, scraping, energetic."

The Bruins will definitely have to be all of the above in facing when they face the Wildcats and Sun Devils at their respective homes. Neither team has given up a match at home.

"I think it's going to be two dog fights," said Decret.

The leaders of the pack for UCLA will be No. 9 Grinda, No. 17 Allegre, and No. 40 Breen. Senior Roland Kupka and sophomore Jean-Noel Lacoste will lead the Wildcat pack, and No. 66 Gustavo Maracaccio and sophomore Alex Osterrieth will hold the Sun Devil pitchfork.

losses (one to Washington by one point and the other to Arizona by four) the Bruins showed more focus than in previous lackadaisical wins, like the road victories against Oregon State and California.

"We could have won both of those games, it came down to, what I think, was a call," Toby Bailey said, referring to last-second fouls called against the Bruins in both games. "So I'm not worried about that. I think that we played better in those losses than we have when we have beaten most of the teams this year."

A key to UCLA having a successful run in the Big Dance and defeating Miami (18-9) will be its pressure defense. The press allows the Bruins to play the up-tempo game that suits the team with a roster that lacks height, but is one of the quickest in the nation. Moreover, it would force the Hurricanes, who shoot a 28.4 percent three-point clip, to score from the outside.

"We could definitely look to press (Miami) especially if it's going to be slow tempo," UCLA head coach Steve Lavin said. "I think teams have zoned them and have had good success."

But UCLA's press is contingent on Henderson and freshman Baron Davis staying out of foul trouble, a problem which has plagued UCLA throughout the season. Davis has fouled out of nine games this year, while Henderson has had to leave early four times. It is especially important for Henderson to stay in the game, as he is the Bruins' major presence in the paint.

"It's really a 50-50 chance of me getting into foul trouble or the other team's big guy getting into foul trouble," Henderson said. "The way that matchup goes, if I get into foul trouble first, then we will have a better chance of losing."

And there have been highly ranked teams that have lost to Miami, like then No. 8 ranked Connecticut, and then No. 19 West Virginia. The Hurricanes, who lost in the first round of the Big East Tournament to Georgetown, are led by Tim James. James, a 6-foot-7-inch junior, averages 16.9 points and 9.5 rebounds. This is only the second time in Miami's history that it has made an appearance in the NCAA tournament.

(19-9) take on the seventh-seeded Bruins (19-8) today at 4 p.m. in Tuscaloosa, Ala., in the first round of the Midwest regional. Guevara's worst nightmare will come true as her perimeter team will have to battle the huge front court of UCLA.

"I love that (comment)," UCLA head coach Kathy Olivier said, who's team features four post players above 6-3. "I was just telling (Coach Steve) Lavin that he could borrow Janae if the men's team plays Michigan in the second round. It sounds like Michigan is apprehensive about our size because all they have is one big girl."

But that one big girl is very talented. Her name is Pollyanna Johns, an all-Big Ten selection. The 6-3 senior led the conference in rebounding (9.6) and shooting percentage (62 percent).

Olivier compares Johns to All-American Olympia Scott, Stanford's center, which is a scary thought. But Johns will have her hands full trying to control the Bruins' four post players who all shoot over 50 percent from the field.

The Bruin front court is led by sophomore Maylana Martin, a 6-3 All-American candidate. Martin leads the team with 19.4 points and 7.8 rebounds per game.

Hubbard, who is appropriately nicknamed "Shaq" by her teammates, will start as center alongside Martin.

Hubbard, who averages 10.5 points and 5.4 rebounds per game, has been playing the best ball of her collegiate career the last two weeks.

Hubbard destroyed Washington State's front court on Feb. 27, scoring at will in the paint. She poured on a career high 26 points on 11-of-13 shooting and nabbed 18 rebounds.

A week later against No. 9 Arizona, Hubbard punished the Wildcat front court. The Los Angeles native scored 16 points and grabbed 17 boards.

"Janae has the size and the height," Olivier said. "When she is on, I don't care who's playing her."

Olivier also can go to her bench for more size. She routinely sends in 6-4 sophomore Carly Funicello and 6-3 senior Carla Houser for extra size in the front court.

"I think that our four post players have been dominating all year long," Olivier said. "I think that they all work off of each other."

In order to combat the Bruins' huge height advantage, Guevara and her Wolverines will feature an up-tempo transition game.

"There is no secret that we like to run the basketball," Guevara said. "We start four guards. We got four kids that can shoot the three. So we will shoot the three and we will run the ball."

The Wolverine perimeter is led by sophomore guard Stacey Thomas, last season's Big Ten freshman of the year. She, along with guards Molly Murray, Anne Lemire and Anne Thorius, has helped make Michigan the leading three-point shooting percentage team in their conference at 40.8 percent.

Takiyah Jackson fights for the ball.

Friday's game will feature a battle of two contrasting styles – the perimeter players from Michigan vs. the post players from UCLA.

"The question is are they going to have to adjust to us, or are we going to have to adjust to them?" Olivier said.

Olivier feels confident that her Bruins will make the Wolverines transform to their inside style.

"That's something we have been doing all year long," Olivier said. "We like to get the ball inside and we are going to try to continue that in the tournament."

ues to be the team kill leader, averaging 5.53 kills per game and hitting .446. Tom Stillwell, his counterpart in the middle, is hitting .430 with 3.43 kills per game.

Overall, UCLA is outhitting opponents .356 to .226, while outserving them 2.2 to .70.

In addition, the Bruins have added motivation for the match, as UCLA will be looking to avenge last year's loss.

"I'm sure we'll be ready to go," Scates said. "There's no question about that. We'll be up for Stanford. We'll be focused, we'll be ready."

After Friday night's match, the Bruins will visit Stockton to take on the University of the Pacific. UOP is 6-10 and 3-9 in the conference. The Tigers lost All-American opposite Greg Wakeham and have not fared well thus far into the season.

WOODEN

ed it is because something you couldn't see so I wanted to get something you can see and gradually I came up with the idea of the pyramid.

I started out with the cornerstones and never changed that – work hard and love what you're doing. One is industryism and the other is enthusiasm. Don't worry about what others think, just you make the best of what you have.

In fact, your reputation and character are two things that define you – your reputation is what others perceive you to be, and your character is what you really are. You are the only one who really knows what your character is. Now, that is just in general, I can talk an hour on the pyramid.

Basketball has undergone a tremendous amount of change – both in the style of play and the rules of the game – since you last coached. If you could change one thing about the college game today what would it be?

You'd be surprised at what I might say. If I could change just one thing, it might be to abolish the dunk.

It's the most exciting thing as far as fans are concerned – fans roar when there's a dunk. And yet, they make a real good play, like a screen-and-roll or a nice cut or give-and-go, where there is teamwork involved and you'll get a smattering of applause.

I think there's too much showmanship today. We talked about change, there's far more showmanship, and I don't like showmanship. When I coached, behind the back pass or behind the back dribble, or something excessive in showmanship meant you went to the bench. I think that, to me, has hurt the game. This is just an opinion now, it doesn't mean it's fact.

With the prevalence of all-sports television and radio stations, as well as electronic media and other such outlets, media pressure nowadays is incredibly intense. Was it that intense when you coached at UCLA?

It is the same, but I don't think it amounts to a hill of beans. If the coach permits the media or the alumni, or the parents, or any outside thing from that point to bother him in any way that's a weakness.

There's only one type of pressure that's important, it's the pressure that you put on yourself. I don't care what you're doing – whether it's your job or some other job, or a dentist, or a surgeon, or a groundskeeper or whatever, it doesn't matter – the pressure you put on yourself is the only thing that really matters.

What about the differences in recruiting?

I think it's changed in the fact that they're going to a farther field to recruit. We've had coaches at UCLA that have gone to Czechoslovakia and places all over across the country. I didn't used to do that at all, and not many coaches did either.

Now you see so many California high school players playing back in the Midwest, and they didn't used to do that. If you do a good job you will draw good players from other areas who find out about you. But, in places like Southern California, the population is here and all the activities here. You should just try to keep the ones here that you can and if you do a good job other good ones will come to you.

I never went to New York to visit Lew Alcindor. I never visited players from out-of-state to come here, I wanted them to be interested in us. I don't think they do that anymore.

Is it necessary? Well, I think it would be necessary if you coached in Eugene or Pullman and other places, but I don't think it's necessary in Southern California because the population is so much here and the athleticism of all our youngsters in all sports is just enormous.

Over the past two decades, the style and attitudes of the players as a whole have dramatically changed. It seems that sometimes teamwork has taken a back seat to individual glory, at least much more often than when you coached. Considering that, if you were still in your prime and were given the chance to coach college basketball in modern times, would you do it?

Teaching is the most wonderful profession. The two most important professions in the world are parenting – that's the most important –and teaching. You bet, I would love to teach youngsters and work with them. And I think if you are fair with them and be consistent with your fairness, you will be fine.

You don't have to treat them all alike, that's being unfair. If you treat them all alike, that's showing prejudice. You have to try to give everyone the treatment they earn and deserve.

If you try to do that and recognize the fact you are imperfect and you're not going to be correct all the time, and if you try to give everyone the treatment they earn and you listen to them if they want to be heard, I don't think there would be any more problems than there were in the past.

Now, lets turn a little bit back toward UCLA. How much communication do you have with the Bruin coaches and players?

If they contact me, I'll talk to them. I never want to be put in a position where it could be seen that I was interfering. I have stayed away from basketball banquets for that very reason, and I don't go to practice. The only time I ever go to practice is if some coach asked me to come and give my opinion on something. I have done that in the past years, when I have been invited by the coach specifically to do that. I would never go in to practice voluntarily.

After all these years is Pauley Pavilion still a special place for you?

Yes, it is. I still think Pauley Pavilion is one of the greatest places for the opposing teams of any place I know.

The fans are farther from the floor and that's better for the opposing teams. I wanted the first row of bleachers on the side to be at least 12 feet from the sideline and the ends to be at least 20 feet from the end lines. I had something to do with that and I like that.

I wanted the opposing team's dressing room to be identical to the home team's dressing room, and it was that way when it was built.

I've gone to places where the opposing team was living in luxury and the home team would hang their clothes on nails – things of that sort. I wanted to give treatment to opponents the same treatment our team would receive – just the way I would like to be treated. Some people said I was crazy.

There has been much controversy aroused in the recent shrinking of choice seats in the student section. What is your opinion of that?

I permitted my name to go on the Wooden Center because it was going to be for the students and not just the athletes. In many ways, we do too much for the athletes – in many ways, not always. Primarily it was going to be for students, and I am very proud that activities have gone on in there.

So, obviously I think a lot of students. I think we have interscholastic athletics for the students.

But at the same time, you know the reason they do that? How much money did the women's athletics program make? How about the expenses? It's a lot. Where are you going to get that money? You're going to get the money from two sports – basketball and football – so the answer to the question is I understand why they have to do it.

You speak of the money, generated by the two main sports. Now, a majority of that comes from television contracts. What kind of influence has television had on college basketball?

To me television is the worst thing that ever happened to collegiate basketball. It interrupts the flow of the game because of extra time outs. It has made actors out of players, coaches and officials to some degree. It has brought about playing games every day of the week, every hour of the day.

A lot of games now are played on Sundays, and it's primarily because of television. I think it's been the worst thing for intercollegiate basketball.

Television may have had a dramatic impact on another part of the college basketball – the NCAA Tournament which started this week. When you coached the NCAA Tournament had, at various times, only 16 or 32 teams. It has since increased to 64 schools. Is this good for the game?

I think it ought to be a tournament of champions. I don't believe, for example, that Arizona should have had an opportunity to win the championship, and they did. I don't think a team that finished fifth in their conference belongs in it.

Now there might have been reasons why it happened – it's a long season and you have injuries and what not. But, I think it should be based on how well you do all season long in the conference. You play a home-and-home game with every team in the conference – those are the ones that you go for.

If you're going to go that far, you may as well let them all in. And all the receipts that will eventually go to the teams that get in, all the receipts from the tournament – TV, radio, sales, everything – should be divided into equal shares, and you get one share for every game you play.

So, half of all the teams in there are going to get one share. Then the half that's left gets two shares. And eventually, instead of a team getting a million, a million and a half dollars, every team is going to get 50 or 60 thousand dollars. Let them all in. If you're going to let 64 in, let them all in.

Give us your assessment on UCLA's chances in the tourney?

There's probably only 15 or 20 of the 64 that could possibly win it. You have to go with the team that seems to the best, and that would be either Arizona, Duke, North Carolina or Kansas.

I'd like to see UCLA win it, but when you analyze the way they played against the top teams all year long. What did they do against Stanford? What did they do against Arizona? What did they do against North Carolina? What did they do against Duke? They lost. I would say if you analyze it, I don't pick them as one of the teams that will win it. They are the one I hope wins it, but I can't pick them to.

UCLA is entering the Tourney as a sixth seed and is not expected to go very far. Do you have any advice for them from the man who won an NCAA record 38 consecutive Tournament games?

Well, it's kind of an old cliché. My feeling is to always concentrate on today. The past will never change. The future can only be affected by what you do today. Don't worry about particular opponent or where you're going, concentrate on the one thing of which you can do – that is make the effort to do the best of what you're capable of.

The second part of the John Wooden interview will appear in Thursday. Among other topics, he will discuss a wide variety of hot issues in college and professional basketball, explain why he never coached in the NBA, and talk about his lasting legacy in Westwood.

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make your ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

PROJECT ENGINEER (IN CHINA)

US Filter/Kinetics is the nations largest high-purity process piping contractor, providing turnkey solutions to the semiconductor industry. We seek an entry-level Project Engineer fluent in Mandarin Chinese (written/verbal) to assist our project manager with material expediting, labor and material utilization tacking, field installation verification, and material acquisition, among other duties.

Job will last nine-months-1 year in China, with the possibility of other European/worldwide job sites. Engineering/Construction experience preferred; but more importantly, we seek an individual with an enthusiastic desire to learn our business. Our projects are authorized for US passport holders only. Company provides arrangements for housing and living expenses.

Please send your resume to our corporate headquarters:
USF/Kinetics
P.O. Box 5085
Santa Clara, CA 95056-5085
Fax: (408) 496-6162

Medical Degree/MD Program

Hope Medical Institute (HMI) is currently accepting applications for September/October 1998 semesters from committed students. If you are:

- College graduate with pre-med background
- College graduate without pre-med background but desire to be M.D.
- 2-year college graduate with concentration in science courses
- High school graduate who wants to become a M.D.

The next semester starts September/October 1998 at various affiliated institutions in Europe. Courses are conducted in the English language. The institutions and programs are well recognized by the World Health Organization and American Medical Exam Boards.

HMI will help committed students in securing needed financing for their higher education. Due to very limited time and availability of space, apply immediately if you think you have what it takes to be a good physician. Call for further information at:

Marijuana debate continues

PROPOSITION 215: Voters have mixed reactions to implementation of law

By Claudia Flores
Daily Bruin Contributor

Sixteen months have passed since Proposition 215 was passed by California voters, and still the state cannot reach a consensus on its distribution.

In the 1996 November elections, Proposition 215, a measure which allowed the possession and cultivation of marijuana for medical use, passed in the state of California.

UCLA voters passed the proposition with a margin of 66 percent, and according to a L.A. Times poll of random Californians, they voted 56 percent for the proposition.

According to Vibe magazine, Dennis Peron, author of Proposition 215, was inspired to pursue the legalization of marijuana for medical patients as a result of a painful AIDS-related death of a loved one.

Since it passed, the fledgling proposition has thus far had a rough life under the constant attack of Attorney General Dan Lungren for breaking federal drug laws.

Starting in 1997, marijuana clubs sprang up throughout the state and served as distributors of marijuana.

In January of 1997, over 8,000 patients designated marijuana clubs as their primary caregiver in order to obtain medical marijuana from them.

But in April 1997, the crackdown began when Lungren placed an injunction that prohibited marijuana clubs from distributing to anyone unless they qualified as "true primary caregiver."

Lungren argued that cannabis clubs could not play the role of a "true primary caregiver" because they did not fit the description of "a friend, a loved one, a neighbor, a nurse who consistently checks on the patients' needs – to provide marijuana should the patient not be able to provide for himself or herself."

In January 1998 Michael Yamaguchi, U.S. Attorney of Northern California, filed a civil lawsuit accusing six marijuana clubs of repeated violations of the federal drug

Raza Youth Conference relives Blowouts of '68

OUTREACH: High school students encouraged to continue their education

By Barbara Ortutay
Daily Bruin Contributor

In March 1968, over 20,000 students walked out of their high schools in protest of the state of Chicano education. Today, the event is remembered as the East Los Angeles High School Blowouts.

Reviviendo las Explociones, (Reliving the Blowouts) was the theme of Saturday's fifth-annual Raza Youth Conference, organized by UCLA's MEChA (Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlan).

Though three decades have passed, "we are under siege in our nation's schools," said keynote speaker Sal Castro.

Castro was one of the leaders in 1968's blowout, and currently teaches at Belmont High School near downtown Los Angeles. Students welcomed him with a standing ovation as he took the stage.

The conference urged students to "finish high school, graduate, and pursue higher education," said Lina Velasco, co-chairperson of the conference. "They have the power to lead the struggle," she continued.

Chicano students face the effects of the anti-bilingual education initiative Proposition 227, and the abolition of affirmative action in college admissions by Prop. 209.

Over 1,200 students, teachers, advisors and parents attended the event, from more than 50 southern California high schools.

Castro's opening speech vividly illustrated a Mexican child's experience in school, from reading Dick and Jane books where "everybody was pink except Spot the dog," to learning history from a white male perspective that pervades most American history books.

Castro brought up examples from American history as seen from the Chicano perspective to illustrate the missing voice in history books.

"There is Mexican blood in the cemeteries of Gettysburg. That's part of your American heritage," he said, draping an American and a Mexican flag over his shoulders.

Following the speech, students dispersed to the over 25 workshops offered. Ranging from "How to go to College for Free" to "Let's Talk About Sex," the workshops offered a wide variety of options for students to learn more about issues facing the Chicano community, as well as what to do about them.

"It makes you think twice," said high school student Horacio Chavez, of the conference's stress on higher education.

One workshop, "Queer Aztlan" addressed the issues facing the Chicana/o queer community through personal experiences, films and discussion.

Speakers defined terms such as homophobia and transgender to students, and promoted acceptance.

"Machismo is emphasized in the Latino community. Women are expected to be domesticated and subservient, and people are supposed to be attracted to the opposite sex," said workshop leader Jamie Estrada-Zambrano.

"For you to be sitting in this room is a big step," he added.

Another workshop, entitled "Pushed out of the High School: What the System Forgot to Tell you," focused on institutionalized racism, classism and sexism, and how it causes inequality in education.

"The school system is designed for white, male, middle-class students," said workshop leader Tomas Duran, a former member of MEChA at USC.

"You get 12 years of institutionalized discrimination by the time you finish high school," he continued.

According to a report by the U.S. Department of Education, 30 percent of Hispanic students between the ages of 16 and 24 drop out of school, compared to 9 percent of white students and 12 percent of African American students.

"We are leading the nation in teen pregnancy and high school dropout rates. That's nothing to be proud of," Castro said.

"Your parents did not send you

Elections Board receives its chairperson

USAC: Last year's investigations chair appointed to ensure smooth elections

By Dennis Lim
Daily Bruin Contributor

Anthony Brockington, USAC's choice for election board chair, is optimistic about running the Elections Board this year.

Brockington, a fourth-year political science student who served as the investigations chair last year, will now take on the responsibility of overseeing all the undergraduate election procedures.

"My responsibilities will be to ensure that elections are fair, impartial and efficient," Brockington said.

As E-Board chair, Brockington will remain somewhat out of the fray. His job will be to organize and run the upcoming spring elections; any charges of election violations made by retired financial committee chair Robert Rhoan will be handled by the judicial board.

Brockington sees his new position as an expansion of his position last year as E-Board investigations chair.

Also, Brockington feels his experience will help him make up for the late appointment.

"Last year we had a similar situation. The appointments came a couple weeks later than this year, and we still got

U.S. News refuses shift in rank for law school

U.S. News and World Report has refused to change its ranking for the University of Texas School of Law, saying the school submitted updated information too late.

Attempting to combat its fall from 18th to 29th in the magazine's rankings, the law school submitted revised numbers Wednesday showing that 91 percent of students who graduated in 1996 were employed. It was originally estimated that 84 percent of the graduates were employed, contributing to the lower ranking.

But magazine officials said revising the rankings would be unfair to the other schools.

"It strikes members of this magazine's staff as a positive development that your law school is improving its tracking of placements, but changing the University of Texas School of Law's rankings as a result of updates you made after the U.S. News rankings were completed and released also strikes us unfair to other law schools in the rankings," said Lincoln Caplan, U.S. News special projects editor.

Sharlot, dean of the UT School of Law, said the magazine's decision was unfair.

"It's shocking now that they know the real data, they would continue to show the wrong data," he said.

The drop in rankings was attributed to the law school's failure to track the employment status of 61 students. The magazine automatically classified 75 percent of those students as unemployed.

After the magazine published the rankings in February, the law school began tracking down recent graduates and asked for a correction of the rankings.

"We recognize – while deploring – the power that your rankings appear to have on the decisions of the public regarding the relative attractiveness of law schools and their graduates," Sharlot said in a March 3 letter to the magazine.

Two Los Angeles papers folding

The Copley Press shut two of its Los Angeles County newspapers this weekend, and cutting up to 100 jobs at a third because of dwindling profits and growing competition.

Friday's editions of the Santa Monica Outlook and the San Pedro News-Pilot were the papers' last. A third paper, The Daily Breeze in Torrance, will continue to publish, but will face up to 100 job cuts between business and newsroom employees, the company said. Approximately 55 full-time employees and a score of part-timers lost their jobs at the closed newspapers.

La Jolla, Calif.-based Copley said it was pushed into the move by the papers' declining market share.

Indeed, analysts said the closures reflect a new era of competition in the Southern California newspaper market.

Morton said three newspaper companies dominate the greater Los Angeles readership and advertising base: MediaNews Group, publisher of the Daily News of Los Angeles, Long Beach Press-Telegram, San Gabriel Valley Tribune, Pasadena Star-News and the Whittier Daily News; Times-Mirror Corp., publisher of the Los Angeles Times; and Freedom Communications Inc., which publishes the Orange County Register.

The three major media companies have left little room for smaller players, or in Copley's case, players unwilling to invest heavily in their publications, he said.

"It's become very competitive, with much bigger players than you used to have," Morton said. For papers the size of the Outlook and News-Pilot, which had weekday circulations of 23,840 and 13,500 respectively, "Unless you've got an alliance with lots of other papers, you don't stand out much for advertisers," he said.

Approximately 70 people were laid off by the closures, most at the 123-year-old Outlook.

Beyond Riverdance

Before you kiss the Blarney stone, pinch people not wearing green, grab a colored brew and see if you can catch a leprechaun, find out the real deal behind St. Patrick's Day

By Michelle Navarro
Daily Bruin Staff

From pots of gold at the rainbow's end to magically delicious cereals, Irish folklore has woven its way into America. However, nothing illustrates this more than the festivities sparked by St. Patrick's Day. Come March 17, everybody's Irish.

But there is a wee bit more to it than just shamrocks, mugs o' beer, buttons that say "kiss me, I'm Irish," the Lucky Charms guy and wearing green. Although each of those have traces to Irish culture, they're not the cause for the celebration. March 17 is actually a day reserved by the Catholic Church to commemorate a saint by the name of (surprise surprise) Patrick.

The factual history of the saint is blended with a tad of legend. A few of the stories surrounding St. Patrick have not been confirmed, making it difficult to draw the line between folklore and fact.

"There's a lot of myth and misinformation," said Cindy Yoshitomi, campus minister for the University Catholic Center.

As it is told, St. Patrick wasn't even Irish, and his name was originally Maewyn Succat. Some reports say he was born during the latter half of fourth century A.D. in Wales, while still others report he was born in Scotland.

Either way, most confirm that at the age of 16, the pagan was kidnapped by pirates. Apparently the luck o' the Irish wasn't with him just yet. He was then sold into slavery, working as a shepherd, in Ireland. While in captivity, Patrick discovered Christianity.

"After I came to Ireland – every day I had to tend sheep, and many times a day I prayed – the love of God and His fear came to me more and more, and my faith was

Pre-Law Society offers students taste of real-life legal practice

CAREERS: From forums to LSAT tips, club keeps its members a step ahead

By Emi Kojima
Daily Bruin Contributor

While UCLA law students go about their daily lives taking classes and cramming for tests, a group of undergraduates on campus dream about being in their place.

"UCLA is my dream school," said Scott Yang, fifth-year political science major.

None other than the Pre-Law Society, the organization trains students to do everything they can to be good lawyers both in skill and in ethics.

Recently the organization decided to enter the American Mock Trial Association and try their hand at the competition.

On Feb. 20 through 22, UCLA's Pre-Law Society sent two teams competed in the regional tournament for the first time against teams from Redlands, Claremont, and of course, USC, among others.

> "As future lawyers, we learned ... to be ethical."

> Pre-Law Society member

"The important thing we learned is to be fair and not to cheat like other teams," Minh Nguyen, president of the Pre-Law Society and fourth-year economics major, said of the mock trial competition.

"The good guy won," he said, "As future lawyers, we learned the lesson to be ethical."

The two teams placed third and fifth in the competition, beating USC. Both teams will advance to national competitions.

The team in fifth place will need to beat out other hopeful teams in the "silver" competition on March 20 in order to attend the final national competition to which the third-place team has qualified for by its high placement.

"There was hugging and kissing at the end and we brought the trophies home for UCLA," Yang, also the internal director of the organization, said.

"It's a great feeling. I haven't felt this way in my five years of being here," he said.

The Pre-Law Society defines its mission to help members decide whether or not to attend law school, expose them to different legal fields, and help them through the admissions process.

Buying votes not as simple as it seems

CANDIDATES: History says that money spent on ads isn't indicative of victory

By Doug Willis
The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO – Rich candidates who wage self-financed campaigns for high political office are a common phenomenon in California, and they all have one thing in common: They have all lost.

Despite that, they just keep coming – this year in record numbers, and with more money than ever before.

Al Checchi, whose personal fortune is estimated at over $600 million, is leading the spending brigade in his campaign for the Democratic nomination for governor.

Statewide television campaigns in California cost $500,000 to $1 million per week, and candidates for major offices usually save their money to go on the air in the final four to six weeks before election day.

But Checchi has been on television every day for four months now.

He has already set a spending record on TV ads in a California primary – $10 million – and his campaign manager says he is increasing his TV spending beginning this week.

"We've been on the air since Nov. 17, and we will not go off the air until June 2," Checchi's campaign-chief Darry Sragow says.

In the past two months, two other multimillionaire candidates have joined Checchi with statewide television ad campaigns: Jane Harman, who is also running for the Democratic nomination for governor, and Darrell Issa, who is seeking the Republican nomination for the U.S. Senate.

> Few (rich candidates) are ... familiar names today to anyone but the most dedicated political junkies.

Checchi, Harman and Issa are currently spending a combined total of about $2.5 million a week on television ads, and the June 2 primary is still 2 and a half months away.

Compare that to the plans of the three other candidates in those races, all of them politicians of modest personal wealth who are relying on contributions from supporters.

Lt. Gov. Gray Davis, running against Checchi and Issa for the Democratic nomination for governor, has raised $4 million. He hopes to double that in the next few weeks, and start airing his television ads in late April.

State Treasurer Matt Fong, who is running against Issa for the Senate, hasn't released any information on his campaign finances since his Dec. 31 report of $596,000 cash on hand.

But Sal Russo, who is planning Fong's television campaign, says Fong "will be competitive in that last month, and it is the last month when voters really focus, pay attention and make their decisions."

U.S. Rep. Frank Riggs, the third candidate running for the GOP nomination for the Senate, has even more modest goals. He hopes to raise $1.3 million for the entire primary. He doesn't rule out television, but that budget doesn't have room for more than a token TV presence.

Davis, Fong and Riggs all say they are confident voters will choose their records and experience over the promises and self-created television images of their multimillionaire opponents. And all three have adopted similar "this-election-can't-be-bought" themes.

Davis, in particular, made that a major point in his formal campaign announcement last week.

"I know two things. Your vote is not for sale, and I know I offer voters a wealth of experience that money simply can't buy," said Davis, who has 24 years of experience in elected and appointed state

State, nation face bitter battle over Prop. 226

UNIONS: Labor leaders warn passing law would throttle political process

By John Howard
The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO – A national crusade to cut the clout of organized labor faces its fiercest fight in California, where conservative business interests hope to choke off millions of dollars in unions' political spending.

Proposition 226 on the June ballot would prohibit labor unions from using their members' dues for political campaigns without the members' written permission, renewed annually.

With a fifth of California's work force unionized and organized labor aiming to defend its political power, the battle is being watched closely around the country.

"Everything I do will be dwarfed by the election results in California," said campaign strategist Grover Norquist, an ally of House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

"Then the national media will start covering it, Time Magazine will do its cover story, talk radio will cover it."

Rivals agree.

"It's do or die. The real play here is to freeze labor unions and working people out of the November election – plain and simple," said Jose Moreno, a spokesman for the opponents.

Some 2 million California workers have AFL-CIO affiliated contracts, while 280,000 workers – mostly classroom teachers – are represented by the California Teachers Association.

A political coalition, headed by Norquist and ultraconservative Indiana insurance mogul Patrick J. Rooney, has heavily supported the "payroll protection" initiative.

They say union workers who oppose their leaders' politics have been exploited for years by being forced to donate funds to causes they oppose.

Republican Gov. Pete Wilson, chairman of the California campaign and sensing an issue for a possible 2000 presidential campaign, is more blunt: He calls the practice a

EDUCATION: Faculty demonstrators support union bargaining goals

By Kiley Russell
The Golden Gater

SAN FRANCISCO – SF State faculty and staff members marched to Malcolm X Plaza yesterday to bring attention to what they see as threats to quality education in the California State University system and to support their union's ongoing contract negotiations.

The group of about 30 marchers, dressed in tattered graduation caps and gowns and followed by members of the local press, marched from 19th Ave. and Holloway to the plaza stage, pausing at the administration building to chant slogans and sing pro-union songs.

Once the rally made it to the stage, speakers, including California Faculty Association Chapter President Margo Kasdan, Clinical Counselor Richardo Gutierrez and Anti-California Educational Technology Initiative Coalition Co-Coordinator Claire Tran, addressed the crowd.

The speakers focused on the need for increased state funding for the CSU system, reduced class sizes, higher faculty wages and keeping the number of tenure-track faculty positions from giving way to an increasing number of part-time lecturers. Speakers also voiced concerns about CSU plans to commit to the public/private partnership with Microsoft, GTE, Hughes and Fujitsu, known as CETI.

The rally coincides with the end of the first month of contract negotiations between the union and the CSU system.

"It is a rally in support of our (union's) bargaining goals," said Kasdan in an interview before the march. "We have concluded the first month of bargaining for a contract that should be decided upon by the end of this semester. I'm trying to educate my own faculty and administration as to the needs of the students and I'm trying to protect faculty rights."

According to Jim Smith, CFA communications director, salaries for faculty in the whole CSU system are about 11 percent below that paid to faculty in comparable university systems around the country.

The rally was an opportunity for the CFA to grab the attention of people lounging in the sun around Malcolm X Plaza

While the demonstrators sang "You can't scare me / I'm stickin' to the union," 23-year-old Mona Villa expressed concerns similar to Huynh's.

"I support the teachers. Definitely," said Villa, a graduate student in the English department. "They cut a lot of teachers from the department last year. Students need to realize that it affects them, that's why it takes so long to graduate here because the administration does not want to commit to getting enough quality faculty. I'm getting sick of sitting in on crowded classes to maybe get added halfway through the semester."

"I think that faculty should have a say in the governance of the university," said Abdiel Onate, an SF State history professor of seven years who marched with his CFA colleagues yesterday. "In this university, there has been a tradition of faculty participation and governance."

According to Kasdan, the university administration supports the union's salary requests.

"The faculty is really trying to bring attention to the salary gap and it is clear that the administration at SF State is supportive of closing that gap," Kasdan said.

The CSU administration at the state level expects contract negotiations to go smoothly.

"I'm optimistic that we can reach an agreement by May 8th unless we run up against a brick wall," said Sam Strafaci, senior director of human relations for the CSU system responsible for negotiating with the CFA.

He added, however, that the union hasn't even made a salary proposal yet.

"I'm perplexed by the need for a demonstration when the union has not given a proposal on salary or benefits," Strafaci said.

Baghdad calls on U.S. to normalize relations

IRAQ: Editorial calls for end to 'futile and costly' economic oil sanctions

By Wael Faleh
The Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq – In a change from its usual anti-American rhetoric, Iraq on Sunday urged the United States to "courageously" change its policies and normalize relations with Baghdad.

An editorial in the state-run Baghdad Observer said that such a move by President Clinton and British Prime Minister Tony Blair would be in their political and economic interests.

The two countries have been the main supporters of keeping punishing U.N. trade sanctions on Iraq. The sanctions, which ban the unlimited export of oil, were designed to punish Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein for his 1990 invasion of Kuwait, which set off the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

The U.N. Security Council has said the sanctions won't be lifted until U.N. inspectors certify that Iraq has eliminated its weapons of mass destruction.

The editorial called for "a daring step by reasonable and realistic politicians" to reassess American policy toward Iraq and "eventually call for direct talks with the government of Iraq so as to normalize relations."

The editorial, signed by the Observer's editor Naji al-Hadithi, said that the White House and its allies in Britain had used the sanctions to try to undermine Iraq's leadership.

It said this was "futile, costly and unwarranted policy" and urged the United States to "courageously reshuffle it for a more realistic one that serves America's legitimate interests as well as the cause of peace, security and stability in this region."

In an interview published Sunday in the weekly Al-Musawir Al-Arabi, Iraq's deputy foreign minister, Riyad al-Qaisi, said Iraqi-American talks were likely.

Convicted killer hopes to donate kidney, escape death penalty

DONOR: State legislature to debate trading organs for sentence reduction

By Jason Srait
The Associated Press

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. – Milton V. Griffin, scheduled to be executed Mar. 25 for choking, beating and fatally stabbing a man in 1986, says he would gladly swap a kidney or some bone marrow to save his neck.

"I can never make up for the crime that I committed," Griffin, 37, said from his southeastern Missouri prison cell.

But with an organ donation – in exchange for sparing his life – "I can give back to the community."

Such a transaction isn't legal. But it would be allowed under a controversial proposal in the Missouri Legislature.

On the same day Griffin is to die by lethal injection, a House committee is to consider a bill allowing condemned inmates to donate bone marrow or a kidney in exchange for having their sentence changed to life in prison without parole.

Nationally, about 39,000 patients are on waiting lists for kidneys and an estimated 3,000 more await life-saving bone marrow transplants. Missouri has 86 men and one woman on death row.

Rep. Chuck Graham calls his proposal "life for a life."

"We don't have enough heroes to meet the need," said Graham, who supports the death penalty yet contends even the most brutal killers could do something positive for society by donating organs.

There was national outrage about recent reports that China was allegedly executing prisoners to harvest their organs for profit.

Some medical experts have said that organs from any inmate put to death by injection shouldn't be transplanted because the organs could be damaged by the execution process, and in 1984, Congress outlawed sell-

Titanic victims rest in Nova Scotia

TRAGEDY: City hopes movie stirs interest in graves, ship's artifacts

By David Crary
The Associated Press

HALIFAX, Nova Scotia – Two days after the Titanic sank in 1912, a cable repair ship sailed from Halifax with a sad cargo: blocks of ice, embalming fluid and stacks of empty coffins.

Two weeks later, the Mackay-Bennett was back, bearing 190 bodies pulled from the North Atlantic. Most went unclaimed and were buried here.

The graves give Halifax a unique bond to the disaster. And, along with artifacts retrieved from the sea – including an intact Titanic deck chair – now on display at a harborfront museum, the city hopes to convert that tie into a tourist boom in this year of Hollywood-fueled Titanic-mania.

The Mackay-Bennett was the first of three Halifax ships sent to search for the more than 1,500 Titanic victims. Together, the ships found 328 bodies – 119 were buried at sea and the rest were brought the 700 miles to Halifax.

When the Mackay-Bennett reached the disaster site on Apr. 20, 1912, the crewmen were staggered by what they saw.

"As far as the eye can see, the ocean was strewn with wreckage and debris, with bodies bobbing up and down in the cold sea," crewman Arminias Wiseman wrote.

The Mackay-Bennett's cranes, normally used for working on undersea cables, hauled bodies out of the water. Other dead were retrieved by crewmen in small boats.

"It was hazardous, brutal work," said Dan Conlin, a curator at the Maritime Museum of the Atlantic. "The bodies were surrounded by floes of ice."

On Apr. 30, the Mackay-Bennett, dubbed by Halifax newspapers "the death ship,"

Cargo rocket heads for Mir with fresh supplies

MOSCOW – A Russian supply rocket blasted off Sunday with fresh food, water and a new set of wrenches so cosmonauts on the Mir space station can open a hatch and take a spacewalk.

The Progress M-38 cargo ship, propelled by a Soyuz-U rocket, lifted off from the Baikonur Cosmodrome in Kazakstan and will dock with Mir on Tuesday.

The cargo ship was carrying tools to replace three wrenches broken by cosmonauts Nikolai Budarin and Talgat Musabayev, who had to cancel a spacewalk earlier this month because they couldn't open a stubborn lock on a hatch leading outside.

Officials rescheduled the spacewalk for April 1. American astronaut Andrew Thomas is to remain aboard Mir during the walk.

The Progress also was taking a new hatch lock, a new propulsion system, and the usual cargo of water, food, clothes, fuel, scientific equipment and parcels from crew members' relatives.

The two Russians are scheduled to make at least at least five spacewalks by August. They must repair a solar panel on the Spektr module, which was damaged in a collision with a Progress supply ship last June, and replace the propulsion system.

Teacher's pregnancy doesn't surprise family

SEATTLE – The news that a former teacher is pregnant – possibly by the 14-year-old boy who fathered their daughter last year – prompted reactions ranging from revulsion to resignation from her estranged husband and his family.

Mary Kay Letourneau, 36, is serving 7 1/2 years in prison for her sexual relationship with a former pupil. Her lawyer confirmed Saturday that she is six weeks pregnant, and said the boy is the likely father.

Letourneau received a suspended sentence in January after pleading guilty to second-degree rape and agreeing to stay away from him. She was imprisoned in February after she and the boy were found together in a car.

She could face new criminal charges as a result of the pregnancy. Prosecutors would not comment on any new charges.

Letourneau's lawyer, David Gehrke, said she became pregnant just days before she was caught in a car with the boy she was convicted of raping. The two have a 10-month-old daughter, Audrey, who is being cared for by the boy's mother in Seattle.

Letourneau wants to have the baby, who would likely remain with her for 6 months after birth but would probably be removed to her family or foster care, Gehrke said.

Letourneau and the boy have repeatedly said they are in love. In a phone call to the Oprah Winfrey show, she said she wants to marry him.

Sandstorm closes Suez Canal, planes diverted

CAIRO, Egypt – A sandstorm forced the closure of the Suez Canal and the diversion of flights from Cairo's airport Sunday.

The seasonal storm known as a Khamaseen, or 50-day wind, reduced visibility in Egypt's capital to about one-third of a mile.

In Port Said, officials closed the Suez Canal when the wind reached 35 knots. Twenty-eight ships had to drop anchor at the northern and southern ends of the canal. Cairo International Airport rerouted some planes.

A sandstorm last year, described as the worst in 30 years, killed at least 18 people after the wind whipped up fires and poor visibility led to road accidents.

The Khamaseen blows across Egypt every March and April, carrying desert sand into the cities and towns of the Nile Valley.

End of rainbow yields Lotto jackpot

RICHES: Players will have option of traditional or lump-sum payments

By Steve Geissinger
The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO – In a steady stream, morning to night, players throw down their cash at Lotto Liquors to buy dreams of fabulous riches from the California Lottery.

Most smile – a glint flashing in their eyes – at the news that SuperLotto will begin offering its top prize in a lump sum, starting with the Apr. 1 draw.

Instant millionaires!

"I'd want the whole prize now, so I could spend my money in Germany or France or wherever. I don't know when I'd be back," says Roger Beatty. The 51-year-old machinist, sporting a worn baseball cap, places his bet on a counter plastered with hundreds of old winning play slips.

The lottery is changing the top-prize payout to give two options: a lump-sum, upfront jackpot or smaller annual payments over 26 years. The agency hopes the changes will boost lagging sales. Many players like the idea because they get more money sooner – at first.

But there's a catch: Winners taking a lump sum will get only about half the advertised jackpot, which is what the lottery would have to invest to make the annual payments. They would get much more over the long run by opting for smaller annual payments.

And with instant wealth come instant headaches, like deciding what to do with the windfall.

Under the lump-sum plan, players must choose at the time they make their bet if they want a single check. They'll get the dollar amount that the lottery would have to invest today to pay the advertised amount in 26 ever-increasing payments. For a $3 million jackpot, that would be about $1.5 million before taxes.

Winners could invest the lump sum, but will they?

"If they invest, they'd be way ahead of the game," said financial planner Bob Affronti. "But with most people, if they take a lump sum, it's going to be gone in 60 seconds."

Under the old rules, the lottery paid off in 20 equal annual payments – a $3 million jackpot, for example, brought 20 annual payments of $150,000 each. The actual annual payment was $108,000 due to the standard federal tax withholding of 28 percent, or $42,000. There are no state taxes on lottery winnings.

Under the new rules, players will be paid in 26 years, instead of 20. And the dollar amount of the annual installments will grow from year to year – starting at $100,000 a year before taxes, for example for a $4 million jackpot, then slowly growing by about $4,000 a year, to a check for $204,000 before taxes in the 26th year.

Lottery Director William Popejoy said research shows older people especially like the idea of a big payoff. Nineteen of 35 other state lotteries offer a lump-sum choice.

"I'm 81 years old. I'd have to live to be over a hundred to collect it all if I chose the annuity," said James Boyers, a bespectacled former newspaper editor buying his ticket at Lotto Liquors.

"Hell yes, I'd like one lump-sum payoff if I won," said Dominic Vairo. The 84-year-old retired railroad worker is wearing a shirt from Hawaii – his destination if he wins.

Some players will still want the annual payments.

"I'd want the annuity. I'm not very good with money," said Derek Kawate, a 26-year-old parcel service worker.

The new annuity will earn more interest, and therefore pay more than the old annuity. By adding six years to the payoff period, the lottery earns extra interest. Instead of advertising a $3 million jackpot paid by a 20-year annuity, it will advertise a $4 million jackpot, paid in 26 years.

Student newspaper takes on Wilson and UC Regents

LAWSUIT: Trials' result will not affect Board's affirmative action ban

By Laura Schiebelhut
The Daily Californian

BERKELEY, Calif. — A suit filed against the UC Board of Regents and Gov. Pete Wilson could prove that secret negotiations took place before the 1995 regents' vote to end affirmative action in UC admissions policies, attorneys said yesterday.

A federal appeals court announced its decision on Tuesday to allow a student newspaper's case against Wilson and the regents to go to trial.

Following the decision, attorneys for the regents and Wilson said they were pleased that the court ruled the trial could have no effect on the legitimacy of the regents' vote. Attorneys for the paper also said they were content that they may be able to show the regents and Wilson were involved in illegal actions.

In February 1996, a reporter from UC Santa Barbara's Daily Nexus newspaper filed suit against Wilson and the regents, alleging that the governor had made illegal phone calls in which several regents promised Wilson to vote to ban affirmative action in the UC system's application process.

The newspaper's editorial staff has pursued the lawsuit for more than two years, saying the Bagley-Keene Open Meeting Act – prohibiting closed meetings or promises about regent decisions from being conducted by a quorum of state governing boards – was violated.

But because the newspaper surpassed the 30-day statute of limitations on filing such a case, the First District Court of Appeals ruled that the paper could not pursue its efforts to repeal the regents' measures.

Dan Tokaji, an American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) attorney who is representing the newspaper, said that although the paper cannot get the regents vote repealed, he is satisfied with the decision to allow the case to go to trial. He said the lawsuit has a chance to prove that the governor and the regents were involved in wrong-doing.

"We're very pleased with the court's ruling. The point has always been to find out the truth and bring it to the public," he said. "The regents and the governor have vigorously resisted our efforts to uncover information regarding their secret phone conversations."

But Jeff Blair, the regents' head council, said the decision was a clear victory for the board because it does not allow the newspaper to change the regents' decisions.

"Their decision now precludes the plaintiffs from ever recovering the key component of why they brought their case," Blair said. "It's my position that the plaintiffs should now dismiss their case because they've gotten all of the political mileage out of it that they can.

"The Board of Regents has now been publicly scrutinized over this and the public benefit in having this case reaffirming why we have open meetings has been

Bills try to save users from unwanted spam

INTERNET: Unsolicited e-mail target of state, federal representatives

By Jennifer Kerr
The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO — Every e-mail user has gotten it: strange messages promising gobs of income with no effort, some stupendous bargain or something salacious.

Internet users call such junk e-mail "spam." Two California lawmakers want it deleted from everyone's system, and have bills before an Assembly committee this month to do just that.

The Legislature returns this week to a more normal schedule, after a particularly slow week.

More than three dozen senators and Assembly members made their annual trek to Washington, D.C. last week to lobby and schmooze with Congress and federal bureaucrats.

Committees are starting to consider the more than 2,100 bills introduced since the second half of the Legislature's two-year session convened in January.

Budget subcommittees are just getting started on their long task of going through the governor's proposed $73.7 billion budget and deciding what they like and dislike.

California is one of about a dozen states, plus the U.S. Congress, that are considering ways to limit unsolicited commercial e-mail.

The nickname "spam" comes from a Monty Python skit involving a Spam-laden diner menu (typical fare: "Spam, Spam, Spam, bacon, eggs and Spam") at a restaurant.

Internet service provider Whole Earth Networks gets an estimated 3,500 spam messages a day for its 13,000 clients.

Whole Earth's customers "complain pretty much on a constant basis," says Scott Mueller, head of the San Francisco firm.

Mueller is one of several Internet users active in the Coalition Against Unsolicited Commercial E-mail. CAUCE has a World Wide Web site with information about spamming and its efforts to promote legislation outlawing spam. The coalition has 9,390 members, 1,358 of them in California.

It's cheap to send bulk e-mail, but it costs Internet service providers and recipients time and money to receive it, view it and delete it.

"Spam can and will overwhelm your electronic mailbox if it isn't fought," says the Web site. "Over time, unless the growth of UCE (unsolicited commercial e-mail) is stopped, it will destroy the usefulness and effectiveness of e-mail as a communication tool."

CAUCE says few reputable businesses use spam.

Rather, the most common spams are offers for chain letters, pyramid and other get-rich-quick schemes, ineffective health-related products, pirated software, phone sex or pornographic web sites.

Mueller admits any California bill's impact would be limited, because of the interstate and international nature of the Internet.

"But one of the important things, when you look at how legislation tends to work, is the states are very much the laboratory tests for new legislation," he said.

"California is the most populous and most progressive state in the country."

Tax penalties are raging out of control

IRS: Officials say system needs work, hope reform can restore public's faith

By Rob Wells
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The IRS is after more than your taxes. The agency hit errant taxpayers with a bill for penalties and interest totaling $18.3 billion in 1996, and collected more than $4.4 billion of it.

The penalties are so large that even the Internal Revenue Service's commissioner says it's time to re-examine a system that punishes not only tax cheats but also people who make honest mistakes.

The chairman of the main Senate committee that oversees the IRS says the penalties are "out of control."

Finance Committee Chairman Sen. William V. Roth Jr., R-Del., said problems with the penalty system add up to a "reason the income tax is losing the confidence of the American people. Make no mistake about that."

If Congress fixes the system to reduce the amount collected, however, the government would lose revenue. Net interest on penalties and late taxes alone totaled $10.8 billion in 1996. That's greater than the agency's $7.3 billion budget that year.

> "A very big ... problem is ... the collection activity that we do in the IRS."
> Charles Rossotti
> IRS Commissioner

A comprehensive fix is unlikely this year. Roth vowed "to do as much as possible" with a pending IRS overhaul bill but declined to say what that might include.

Assessed penalties and interest have wavered from 1.2 percent to 1.9 percent of total tax collections in the 1990s, with no discernible trend in either direction. But that's a jump from 1979, when simple penalties totaled 0.26 percent of tax collections; figures for interest weren't available then, according to an Associated Press review of IRS data.

IRS penalties outstrip comparable collections from other agencies. U.S. attorneys collected $1.6 billion in civil and criminal debts in 1996. The Securities and Exchange Commission and other Wall Street regulators collected $1.37 billion in financial penalties from 20 major Wall Street firms between 1981 and 1994, according to a 1995 AP study.

Penalties and interest "are often at a level where they actually are a significant disincentive for many taxpayers to reach agreement with the IRS" on tax disputes, said a staff report of the congressionally appointed National Commission on Restructuring the IRS.

Father's deportation leads to son's tragic suicide

INS: Family blames strict immigration regulations for destruction of home

The Associated Press

Relatives think they know what killed Gerardo Anthony Mosquera Jr., and it wasn't drugs, gangs or any of the other dangers that can confront a 17-year-old.

It was, they contend, a government crackdown that deported his father to Colombia after 29 years of U.S. residency for selling a police informant a $10 bag of marijuana in 1989.

Relatives said the younger Gerardo had been despondent since his father was deported before Christmas. One evening about two weeks ago, Gerardo joined a group of friends outside his Bell Gardens home, pulled out a gun and announced, "I'm going to kill myself."

Then he pulled the trigger. He died two days later, on March 2, at a hospital.

"That damn little bag of marijuana," said the boy's mother, Maria Sanchez Mosquera, a school bus driver.

"It turned everything around. It cost my husband his papers. It cost my son his life."

His father, Gerardo Sr., was refused permission by U.S. embassy officials in Bogota to temporarily reenter the United States to attend Saturday's funeral.

"I cannot accept my son's death right now," Mosquera told the Los Angeles Times in a recent telephone interview.

"I'm 4,000 miles away. How am I supposed to act and think? ... I cannot sleep. I've lost 45 pounds. My life is ruined."

The Mosquera family's saga highlights the darker side of the immigration reforms passed by Congress in 1996.

Community workers contend that a crackdown on so-called criminal aliens has torn apart some families and forced them onto welfare.

Acquaintances say it changed Gerardo Jr.

The father of an infant son, he was recalled as a diligent Bell Gardens High School student who enjoyed sports, stayed drug-free and worked after school to try to fatten the household's pocketbook.

But after his father's deportation, Gerardo began missing school, said Joseph Petruzzi, a counselor at his high school.

"He became a different person," his mother said.

"I think he believed my husband walked out on us."

The deportation coincided with a

U.S. firms seek to cash in on Japan's economic crisis

ASIA: Banks think capital on auction block can turn to investment opportunity

By Michael White
The Associated Press

Some big investment firms from the United States are being lured to Asia by Japanese banks' selloff of bad loan portfolios and distressed properties.

U.S. companies are negotiating to buy more than $800 million in non-performing loans in 20 deals that already have closed or are scheduled to close by March 31, according to an Ernst & Young Kenneth Leventhal survey of firms currently shopping in Japan.

The amount is expected to climb much higher as Japanese banks try to shed billions of dollars in bad real estate loans as part of a national effort to rekindle a stagnant economy.

Most investors hope to make a quick profit by buying the portfolios at fire-sale prices and then offering the borrower an opportunity to cash out at a discount.

Whether the selloff also offers U.S. business a chance to boost its presence in Japan for the long term is a more difficult question, experts say.

While there are relatively few formal restrictions to foreign investment in Japan, a difficult bureaucracy and traditional businesses practices have made it tough for new companies to get a foothold.

During 1996, foreign investment totaled $7 billion, or .15 percent of Japan's gross domestic product.

"It's a difficult place to do business more because of language and business customs than anything else," said Richard Mandel, president of the commercial real estate group at Kennedy-Wilson International in New York.

"There's a whole new group of people coming over to do business there. I think it will build confidence in other companies to also go over and do business in Japan.

> Asian nations, including Korea and Thailand, have ... pinned their hopes on outside investment.

"The opportunity to make money in real estate is just the beginning of a wave of other industries that need to be capitalized," he said.

At least initially, the buy-and-sell strategy is probably the best approach to buying non-performing loans, said Jack Rodman, director of Asian real estate services for Los Angeles-based Leventhal.

"The quality of the assets are such that you wouldn't want to hold them and own them for a long time," said Rodman.

But Rodman believes that better quality investments will appear as the selloff progresses, possibly offering investors a chance to buy and hold Japanese properties such as office and apartment buildings.

But one expert cautioned that long-term strategies will pay off only if the Japanese government is successful in reviving the national economy.

"I'm bearish on Japan for one reason: the government has shown itself to be unable to fix the problem for seven years and I see no evidence they're going to be able to fix this problem for another seven years," said Alvin Rabushka, a senior fellow specializing in Asian markets at Stanford University's Hoover Institute.

The government's tradition of working by consensus works well in times of prosperity, but is poorly suited to make the kind of tough decisions needed to lift the country out of stagnation, Rabushka said.

The Leventhal report was based on interviews with representatives of 10 companies that have purchased or are interested in buying non-performing loan portfolios or actual real estate. The companies included Morgan Stanley, Bankers Trust, Secured Capital Corp., Salomon Smith Barney, Deutsche Morgan Grenfell, Goldman Sachs, Lehman Brothers, J.P. Morgan, Crescent Real Estate Equities and mall developer The Mills Corp.

The market is good for foreign investors now because the Japanese need third-party buyers in order to

HISTORY: Dallek reveals former president backed Nixon over Humphrey

By Mike Feinsilber

vention in Chicago that summer. He may have sought a draft for no other reason than the ego-satisfying opportunity to turn it down, Dallek writes.

Dallek's book, "Flawed Giant," to be published by Oxford University Press in April, sheds new light on the pivotal 1968 election, in which Republican Richard Nixon defeated Humphrey by a hair. Nixon's election led to escalation of the war in Vietnam, more than doubling American losses there, and ultimately to the Watergate scandal and the first presidential resignation in U.S. history.

Johnson had deep misgivings about Humphrey, his vice president. He "considered him too soft and too much of a bleeding-heart liberal who would have trouble making tough decisions," Johnson felt, according to Dallek.

Worse yet, in his heart Johnson also believed that Humphrey "would abandon the war the minute he took the oath of office," leaving it to history to label Johnson the first president to have lost a war, Dallek writes.

"He understood that Humphrey was under great pressure to break with him," Dallek said. "To keep close tabs on the inner workings of Humphrey's campaign, Johnson had the FBI tap Humphrey's phones. If Humphrey was going to come out against the war, Johnson wanted advance notice and a chance to dissuade him."

While historians have known that Johnson secretly taped some of his telephone conversations, the only tapes released so far have been those from the first months of the Johnson presidency following the 1963 assassination of John F. Kennedy.

> (Lyndon B.) Johnson secretly supported Nixon and sometimes acted to undercut Humphrey.

Dallek's book, based on interviews with former Johnson and Humphrey aides, offers the first evidence that Johnson ordered wiretaps on Humphrey's phones in the vice presidential office.

Unenthusiastic about the prospects of either a Humphrey or a Nixon presidency, Johnson, according to Dallek, privately urged Republican Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York that spring to get into the race – advice Rockefeller took too late to head off a Nixon victory at the GOP convention a few months later.

Because of his distrust of Humphrey's belief in the war, Johnson secretly supported Nixon and sometimes acted to undercut Humphrey – forbidding his aides, for example, to publicly endorse the vice president.

Johnson's ambivalence about Humphrey increased after Nixon sent the Rev. Billy Graham to play on Johnson's vanity. On Sept. 15, Graham carried word to Johnson that Nixon would give Johnson a share of the credit when the war finally was settled and that Nixon considered Johnson "the hardest working and most dedicated president in 140 years."

During the campaign Johnson told an aide, James Rowe, that on Vietnam "Nixon is following my policies more closely than Humphrey."

Later, however, Johnson became convinced by FBI wiretaps that Nixon was using Anna Chennault, widow of a World War II general, to persuade South Vietnam President Nguyen Van Thieu to sabotage the Paris peace talks with the communists. The president became furious over Nixon's "treason" and began doing more to help Humphrey.

Earlier, Johnson's disenchantment with the voters' likely choices caused him to reconsider his decision not to seek the nomination himself, especially after Robert F. Kennedy's murder in June.

Johnson laid plans that summer to become the nominee, Dallek writes, and maneuvered for a draft-Johnson movement at the convention. He commissioned a film about himself and sent emissaries to Chicago. But his own unpopularity and violent antiwar demonstrations that plagued the convention defeated his plan.

Former Texas Gov. John Connally, Johnson's point man at the convention, said in 1990 that Johnson "very much hoped he would be drafted." Whether Johnson's real intention was that he actually wanted to serve another four years, pressure Humphrey to toe the line on Vietnam or simply wanted the satisfaction of having his party turn to him once again before he could decline with satisfaction is a question still under speculation.

to the public, it currently boasts 141 members who have paid the one-time $50 fee for a lifetime membership.

The Pre-Law Society has been at UCLA since 1968.

This year, the society held its fifth annual law forum with 70 to 80 law schools in attendance. The forum cost the Pre-Law Society between three and four thousand dollars.

"We're the only student organization in America, to my knowledge, able to put on a law forum of this size," Nguyen said.

Additionally, members contribute to their journal, "The Forum" sent to the top 50 law schools across the country to distinguish UCLA undergraduates from other attorney-hopefuls.

Kaplan gives club members discounts on LSAT preparation courses.

"Seventy percent of attorneys are disgusted with their career," Nguyen said, "many undergraduates are not prepared to meet the demands of the legal field."

To expose members to the legal field to shows that what the legal field really is like, the organization

TAXES

Two factors are largely responsible for the growth of IRS penalties:

First, Congress streamlined penalties nine years ago, but shortly thereafter began using penalties as an easy back door to raising revenue without increasing taxes, former IRS and congressional aides said. House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Archer, R-Texas, recalls the mindset of the Reagan White House and the Democrat-controlled Congress in the 1980s: "The idea was, 'Well, we can't increase taxes but we need more revenue,' so we will give the IRS more power to raise penalties and interest."

Second, the IRS sometimes takes years to notify people of mistakes on their returns. Penalties are payable when the tax is due; any interest starts accumulating immediately. Taxpayers sometimes aren't notified about a penalty for two or three years.

"A very big source of the problem is ... that 90 percent of the collection activity that we do in the IRS is after six months," IRS Commissioner Charles Rossotti said.

"By that time, no matter what structure you have, you've got interest and penalties built up."

"I have no trouble acknowledging that this is a major area that needs improvement," said Rossotti.

Last year's Senate hearings revealed that IRS executives in regional offices sometimes counted penalty income to measure the performance of supervisors and workers. To dispel perceptions that agents slap on extra penalties to meet tax-collection goals, the IRS ceased last year using penalty figures in its performance statistics.

No one disputes that tax penalties were created for a purpose – to compel prompt and accurate filing of taxes. The IRS notes that most tax penalties are assessed automatically by computers when taxpayers fail to do something they should, such as remit the full amount of their tax.

The IRS notes it is enforcing laws passed by Congress, imposing penalties under rules set forth in law. The agency said penalties should be viewed in context of the enormous sums it collects.

"When you're collecting ... $1.6 trillion, a tiny percentage of that is a big number compared to the IRS budget," Rossotti said.

realize tax writeoffs from the bad loans.

As Japan searches for foreign buyers of its bad debts, other struggling Asian nations, including Korea and Thailand, have similarly pinned their hopes on outside investment.

South Korea already has liberalized its laws to increase the amount of stock foreign investors can hold in a Korean company, and some believe the government will make it easier to lease or own real property.

Foreigners now can own land or buildings only with a special permit, said Nathan Nahm, an acquisitions specialist with the Wall Street law firm Hughes Hubbard & Reed.

"They are beginning to realize they have only two options," said Nahm, who recently returned from a two-week visit to Korea.

"One is to contract their entire national economy to a much lower level ... (with) layoffs and a lower standard of living, or open the country to foreign investment."

As with Japan, the attractiveness of investment in Korea or other troubled Asian countries hinges on how long it will take for those economies to recover, Rabushka said.

"How long will it take for these countries to look like normal countries again?" he asked.

"How long a haul are you in it for?"

Need to get something off your chest?
Or do you just want to get rid of your chest?
Or sofa? Coffee Table? Whatever.

The law profession is hot again...

Lawyers top the chart of high-paying, fast-growing occupations recently compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The Bureau indicated that between 1994 and the year 2005 there would be 286,000 job openings for lawyers—a 28% increase.
—Newsletter of the Law School Admission Council, March/April 1997

Not since the high-rolling days of the late 1980's have New York's corporate law firms wooed the top law students so assiduously. The economy is surging, lawyers are doing very nicely, thank you.
—The New York Times, August 14, 1997

Boom times just keep getting better for the law business. 'We're having another great year in 1997 for mergers and acquisitions, real estate, tax, litigation, product liability, you name it,' exults Robert Sheehan, executive partner at Skadden, Arps, Meagher & Flom.
—The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 1997

So many firms are recruiting talent that competition recently has become downright brutal for top law school graduates and well-regarded mid-level associates ...many of the lawyers recruited have about seven offers on the table.

service.

There's probably some wishful thinking in Davis' confident claims, and in similar remarks by Fong and Riggs. But it's not all political spin.

Russo says fears that rich candidates can buy elections are unfounded. He dismisses most rich candidates as "millionaires who want to be somebody."

Russo has a list of 13 rich candidates who financed all or part of their campaigns for governor or U.S. Senate in California in the last three decades.

The list begins with Leland Kaiser's Senate campaign in 1964 and concludes with Michael Huffington's Senate race in 1994.

Some made big splashes at the time. But few are even vaguely familiar names today to anyone but the most dedicated political junkies.

"Twelve lost in the primary. Only Huffington won the primary, and then he lost the general, although it was close," Russo said. "That does tell you something – that spending the most money isn't the key to success."

As the number of self-financed candidates increases, some will eventually be successful, Russo says. But not this year.

"This year, in the high-visibility races, governor and senator, I think they're barking up the wrong tree, because never in modern times have we had an electorate that has been more contented and satisfied," Russo said.

"There's a total aversion to someone who says, 'I'm going to go in there and shake things up and create risk.' And that's a message, whether they like it or not, that an outsider who's rich is telling people."

Sragow agrees with Russo's observations about the losing track record of self-financed candidates, but adds a slightly different spin.

"What it says is, you can't buy an election. But if you are wealthy, you can make sure every voter has heard your message," he said.

Sragow's assessment is probably pretty close to the mark. But it may not be as benign as his description suggests – at least not when there are as many rich candidates running as there are today.

There is a real danger that in just getting their messages heard, the candidates who can afford to saturate the state with months of TV ads may drown out everyone else.

INITIATIVES

"massive shakedown."

The proposition is backed by 75 percent of voters polled, according to a recent Field poll. It is supported overwhelmingly in union as well as non-union households.

"That is a remarkable thing – that support is so high in both groups," said veteran pollster Mark DiCamillo.

"But there is a real cautionary flag here: Only a third of the likely voters had heard of Proposition 226; two-thirds were coming to it for the very first time when we surveyed them. So the issue has not yet been joined," he said.

The initiative's passage could force a wave of national change, just as Proposition 13 inspired a nationwide tax revolt two decades ago, or the way Proposition 209 brought attention to affirmative action in 1996.

"That is exactly what is going to happen. You can see it coming down the pike a mile away," said Norquist. He heads a group called Americans for Tax Reform, which in 1996 received $4.6 million from the Republican National Committee for voter-education programs.

Thus far, the depth of the national campaign is uncertain. Proponents are quick to note that similar measures are aimed at ballots this year in Oregon, Nevada, Florida and Arizona, but none have yet qualified.

Bills have been introduced or are pending in at least a dozen other states, but several have been killed and none have been signed into law as of yet.

In an election year, perhaps $20 a year per union worker goes to political activities – a $40 million pool that can finance direct donations, fund-raising, get-out-the vote drives, communications with members, advertising and other programs, said Judith Barish of the California Labor Federation.

But that figure does not include the political spending of the California Teachers Association. In 1996, the CTA alone donated $2.7 million directly to candidates; last year, an off-election year with voter-approved limits in place, it spent far less.

This year, the CTA reportedly plans to spend at least $3 million.

The initiative was drafted in Orange County by businessman Mark Bucher, real estate consultant Jim Righeimer and Frank Ury, a computer engineer. The three are longtime political opponents of the CTA and supporters of change in the educational system.

Their proposal caught the attention of Norquist, Rooney and others, who helped finance its qualification for the California ballot and launch a national movement.

Nationally, the initiative represents the cornerstone of a broad fight between labor and business. The fight shifted to the states after President Clinton said he would veto any similar legislation that emerged from Congress.

But in California, Proposition 226 is seen more as a GOP vendetta against the CTA, which took a leading role in wresting control of the Assembly from Republicans. The CTA overwhelmingly supports Democrats.

The national effort is expected to cost about $20 million, at least half of which is being spent in California. Unions expect to match that spending, and more. The campaign ultimately hopes to target 43 states; part-time legislatures in the seven others don't meet this year.

Unions acknowledge that the initiative doesn't shut off political donations altogether.

But by requiring workers to complete a check-off form, they say, the result is the same: Political donations will be throttled, either through red tape or because members will opt out.

Unlike many ballot measures, Proposition 226 would take effect July 1 instead of the beginning of the following year, so it would apply in November.

That means unions' campaign contributions, which overwhelmingly flow to Democrats, would not play a major role in the November election, which includes races for governor, U.S. Senate, 52 House seats and 100 state legislative seats.

Most important to California politicians: The next governor will decide the next reapportionment – the bitterly partisan, once-a-decade redrawing of political districts.

"People need to understand that it is not just California. It's an attempt to pretty much eliminate labor and working people from having a voice in the political system," Moreno said. "It's framed as fairness, but the reality is it's totally unfair."

DEPORTATION

breakup with Gerardo's girlfriend, who was the mother of his son, the family said.

"I don't know what could be worse than this," his mother said. "To lose him like this ... I just can't bear it."

The elder Gerardo, 38, has returned to his mother's home in Cali, Colombia. He said he has had a difficult time adjusting; his Spanish is rusty, infused with Mexican border slang.

"I was raised in the U.S.," Mosquera said.

"I'm a stranger here. I can't get a job. I don't even know how to look for a job. How the hell am I supposed to survive?"

In 1989 he was sentenced to 90 days in jail after pleading guilty to the sale and transportation of 0.6 grams of marijuana. He later was imprisoned for failing to report to his probation officer. Upon his release, he was turned over to the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service, which led to his deportation.

Under the new immigration laws, selling illegal drugs is an "aggravated felony" that can result in a legal resident being deported and barred from the United States for life.

Mosquera's deportation deprived the family of his $300 weekly pay as a forklift operator.

The family – Mosquera's wife, three children and Gerardo Jr.'s son – is struggling. Money for funeral expenses came from car washes and donations.

Mosquera said he regrets failing to apply for U.S. citizenship in his many years here, although he could have naturalized easily and averted the danger of deportation.

Authorities say he has no one to blame but himself.

"We take this kind of thing very seriously and are really at a loss to do anything but prosecute such cases and initiate deportation proceedings," said Rosemary Melville, deputy district director for the INS in Los Angeles.

She declined to comment specifically on the Mosquera case.

Assemblywoman Debra Bowen, D-Marina del Rey, has a bill before the Assembly Consumer Protections Committee on Tuesday that would require spam senders to provide a toll-free number or e-mail address so the recipient can ask to be removed from the e-mail list. If a recipient has so requested, a spammer could face a $500 fine for every piece of spam sent.

Assemblyman Gary Miller, R-Diamond Bar, has a bill before the committee on March 31 that would allow commercial e-mail to be sent only when there is a preexisting relationship between sender and recipient.

His bill would also allow Internet service providers to sue spammers who send unauthorized messages. They could recover $50 a message, to a maximum of $15,000.

"Contrary to the wisdom of Monty Python, not all kinds of spam go good with eggs," said Bowen.

"Advertisers don't have the right to tie up your phone lines and burn through your fax paper, by sending unsolicited faxes, and they shouldn't have the right to tie up computer systems and slow down your business operations by trying to spam people to death."

RICHES

For players, the gradually increasing annual payments are also a hedge against inflation. That could all be good for winners – except that they will pay more taxes because they're getting more money.

It could also be good for the lottery: The hope is that more players will seek the larger jackpot. And if no one wins one of the twice-weekly jackpots, it rolls over. Bigger jackpots and more players add up to even bigger jackpots.

All this adds to overall sales, which means more money for the lottery and for education, which gets a third of the proceeds.

Sales have fallen below the lottery's potential for years, prompting a reorganization, layoffs and other changes such as adding the lump-sum payoff. The lottery expects to log $2.25 billion in 1997-98 sales, nearly restoring it to the sales of the late 1980s.

"It might lure me into playing weekly again," says Rose Dey, a 64-year-old housewife.

It's that kind of enthusiasm for the lump-sum payoff that worries gambling observers. Critics warn that the lump-sum payoff may worsen problem gambling in California – a concern discounted by lottery officials.

"They think, 'Not only could I win, but I could have it in lump sum,'" said Tom Tucker of the California Council on Problem Gambling. "It feeds into the dream world of the compulsive gambler."

Odds of winning the top prize are 1 in 18 million.

Says a regular lotto player, 44-year-old sales manager Curt Swedlow: "Annuity or lump sum, I just hope I win and have that choice."

met," he added.

Mark Valles, the paper's editor in chief, said, however, that the lawsuit will ultimately demonstrate to regents that they must make all their decisions in public.

"In a way, the decision is a silver lining because it completely depoliticizes the case," he said. "This has never been a lawsuit about affirmative action; it has been about conducting the public's business in the open."

The Daily Nexus has been able to pursue the lawsuit due to the aid of the ACLU, the First Amendment Project and the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights.

Blair said he plans to seek the dismissal of the case based on sworn declarations by regents who say they never gave Wilson a commitment to vote a certain way prior to the public meeting.

Meanwhile, Tokaji said the defendants have resisted answering any questions about the phone conversations made before the meeting. He added that he plans to seek a court order to force the regents to answer questions under oath.

"We have a motion pending which will force the board for the first time to disclose exactly what Gov. Wilson said to them and what they said to Gov. Wilson during their covert conversations," Tokaji said.

- Sell used books directly to other students for more than a book store will offer.
- Buy used books directly from other students for less the bookstores price.

Example: Dick bought a used book from a bookstore for $75.00. He sold the book back for only $25.00. Beddy then bought the same used book for $75.00.

If Dick and Beddy were smart, Dick would have listed his book for sale on the BookTrader websight and Beddy would have looked for her book on the BookTrader websight. Dick could have sold his book directly to Beddy for $60.00, saving himself $35.00, and Beddy $15.00.

RELATIONS

"Iraq does not mind a dialogue with Washington – it calls for it," al-Qaisi was quoted as saying. He predicted that "the United States would seek to open dialogue with Iraq."

In Washington, White House national security spokesman Eric Rubin said those statements alone will not alter U.S. policy toward Iraq because of Iraq's intransigence on U.N. resolutions.

Earlier this month, American officials said the Clinton administration was not interested in a dialogue with Iraq in response to suggestions by Jordan's King Hussein that the two sides talk directly about their disagreements.

The Iraqi statements came amid what appears to be a change in Iraq's dealings with U.N. weapons inspectors following the Feb. 23 agreement negotiated by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

Under the deal, Iraq agreed to open eight of Saddam's palace compounds to U.N. inspection and to improve cooperation with U.N. weapons teams.

Last week, for the first time, Iraq allowed a U.N. team into the Defense Ministry. And next weekend, the chief U.N. arms inspector, Richard Butler, is due in Baghdad to begin the palace inspections.

The Americans and British had threatened military strikes to force Iraq to open the palace compounds but relented after the Annan deal was signed.

On Sunday, U.N. inspection teams paid unannounced visits to eight sites, one with a helicopter, the official Iraqi News Agency reported.

In addition, the agency said, U.N. teams specialized in biological and chemical weapons as well as missiles were in the field. It said that one of these teams visited a state-run university, but did not give details.

GRAVES

approached the dockyards. Church bells tolled, flags hung at half-staff and hearses lined the piers.

Even in death, class barriers were preserved. The bodies of first-class passengers were unloaded in coffins, second- and third-class in canvas bags, crewmen on open stretchers.

Onlookers lined the route as hearses drove to a curling rink at the edge of town. Relatives and friends of the victims began arriving to claim their dead.

Of the 209 bodies eventually brought to the rink, 59 were claimed and taken away. The rest were buried in three Halifax cemeteries.

The biggest group of Titanic graves – 121 – is on a slope at the rear of Fairview Cemetery, overlooking a railroad yard.

There are four rows of stone markers, many with a number instead of a name, and all with the same date of death: April 15, 1912.

The stones with names reflect the ethnic diversity of those on board – Italo Donati, Gustaff Johannson. A few bigger markers have inscriptions honoring the crewmen buried underneath.

"Each man stood at his post while all the weaker ones went by. And showed once more to all the world how Englishmen should die," says the verse on Everett Edward Elliott's gravestone.

One stone is marked with the name J. Dawson. According to Conlin, the man buried there is James Dawson, a crewman who worked in the engine room.

But cemetery workers say teen girls are making pilgrimages to the grave, connecting it with Jack Dawson, the fictional hero played by Leonardo DiCaprio in the movie "Titanic." On a recent morning, a few bouquets of flowers and a ticket from a Mar. 1 showing of the film lay on the grave.

"There are a lot of male third-class passengers buried there," Conlin said. "To think about how their lives came to end – if people can sort of mix that in with their passion for the movie and gain some insights – I think it's good thing."

DONORS

ing human organs in the United States.

But Graham, a Democrat from Columbia, said his proposal wouldn't conflict with federal law because the inmate donations would be voluntary.

National organ donor organizations, medical ethicists and even some patients awaiting transplants are horrified about Graham's idea.

"I wouldn't want those organs in my body," said Carmen Epps, 34, of St. Louis, who has spent more than three years on a kidney waiting list. She would rather continue kidney dialysis than accept an organ from murderers.

Graham said the same judge who imposed the death sentence would have to approve the transplant, and testimony from a victim's survivors would be considered.

Dr. Jeffrey Lowell, assistant professor of surgery at Washington University School of Medicine in St. Louis, questioned allowing a healthy inmate to live while an unhealthy inmate could be executed because he didn't qualify as a donor.

Although the nation needs more organ donors, "The solution is not to come up with far-fetched, cockamamie programs," Lowell said.

"It's real easy to take shots," Graham said. "If the medical community has better ideas, then bring them to me."

The National Conference of State Legislatures has heard of no similar legislation in other states, spokesman Gene Rose said.

Griffin, 37, wouldn't be covered by Graham's bill because condemned inmates would have to request participation within a year after sentencing.

Lowell said the idea isn't medically feasible for many prisoners with histories of abusing drugs and alcohol. For example, the AIDS virus might not be immediately detectable, and inmates might lie when asked about their sexual history or intravenous drug use.

Griffin, who says he was an alcoholic when he entered prison, thinks his kidney would be fine to donate. He admits using cocaine and marijuana but has twice tested negative for HIV.

Still, Lowell said he would disqualify Griffin, not only because of past drug and alcohol abuse but because of sexual "acts that have occurred in prison that he may not want to talk about."

Advocates for organ donations are unconvinced.

"We feel like they should have altruistic reasons" for organ donations, "not for someone having their sentence changed," said Ellie Schlam, spokeswoman for the National Kidney Foundation.

The National Bone Marrow Foundation and the National Marrow Donor Program also oppose the idea.

holds filed trips to the court house to attend a live trial. It also arranges for panels of lawyers to speak to members.

During fall quarter, it helps students with their law school applications.

A new program, the "Community Response Task Force," is in its infant stages and gives students a chance to help others while honing their law skills.

Students provide guiding information about the law, donations, and furniture to families experiencing catastrophes.

"Be careful, be selective in choosing a attorney," Nguyen said he told families.

The Pre-Law Society hopes to distinguish itself even more and gain national recognition with its success in mock trials.

Whether the Pre-Law Society will send their mock trial teams to the national competitions, however, remains to be seen.

The club lacks funds to send one team to the preliminary "silver" round, March 20, and the final round, April 3.

"We are going to beg and plead to the alumni to see if anyone will sponsor us," Nguyen said.

The Pre-Law Society hopes to raise $10,000 in less than two weeks.

"It would be sad for a team with so much potential not to go," Yang said.

"We're at UCLA, there are too many resources on campus around not to send the team because of a lack of money," he said.

ST. PATRICK

strengthened," reads a passage taken from the confessions of St. Patrick as translated from Latin by Ludwig Bieler.

According to one book on saints, Patrick ran away after six years when a dream told him to be ready for a courageous effort that would return him to his homeland.

He escaped to the continent and studied to become a priest. Patrick wanted to return to Ireland to bring Christianity into the relatively pagan country. However, someone else, St. Palladius, was sent to be Ireland's missionary. It wasn't until two years later, when Patrick was 60 years old, that he was made bishop of Ireland.

The validity of the stories that follow continue to be debated to this day.

Several paintings of St. Patrick show his foot upon a snake. This is because he is said to have driven the snakes out of Ireland.

This could be taken at face value, although some historians say that snakes never even resided in the land of the leprechauns, since Ireland broke off from the European continent after the Ice Age. There is another option to interpreting the legend metaphorically.

It might have been a symbolic way of saying he drove paganism from Ireland. This would make sense since the snake is a revered pagan icon.

Yet Irish nuns offered Yoshitomi another take on the story in the 1950s.

"When he came to Ireland, there was a matriarchy," Yoshitomi explained. "In their ceremonies, the women would use snakes. So to the women in Ireland, when you say St. Patrick drove the snakes from Ireland, it meant he took the power away from them."

Legend also has it that Patrick was the sole man responsible for converting the Irish to Christianity. Whether or not he completed that hefty task alone, he did at least play a role in it. As bishop of Ireland, he established and protected schools, churches and monasteries. The saint also rid Ireland of their practice of human sacrifice, said Yoshitomi.

A more popular tale links St. Patrick's sermons and the tiny green plant of luck, the shamrock. According to sources, he used the shamrock to illustrate the Three in One concept: the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit.

The number three wasn't foreign to the pagans however, because it is a mystical number in the Celtic religion. So more than likely, Patrick knew of the gravity of his representation and used it to his advantage.

Bar-goers may remember St. Patrick for a less religious contribution he made, the Pota Phadraig.

According to a book written by Daithi O' Hogain, the Pota Phadraig is a drink of whiskey that began when Patrick had been given a short serving of it at a lodge. He then proceeded to tell the innkeeper that the devil was living off of the innkeeper's dishonesty in the cellar. Naturally, this news frightened him. Patrick told him to change his ways to rid himself from the demon downstairs.

When Patrick returned after some time, he found the innkeeper was more generous with his servings of the hard stuff. This in turn weakened the devil, who was then cast out by Patrick.

In celebration, Patrick declared that all should enjoy a drink of the spirits from then on on his feast day. Today, the drink is known as "drowning the Shamrock" because the tradition is to float the little three-leafed plant in the drink before guzzling.

Thus it is the anniversary of St. Patrick's death that is remembered and observed. What's surprising is how this religious holiday has grown to be a national holiday where Americans basically party hard, wear green, and look for four-leafed clovers and leprechauns. Is that really fair to stereotype the Irish in terms of the angry little men?

"That's the fun side of the Irish," Yoshitomi said, who is of Irish descent.

"Celtic mythology is really environmentally conscious. They are people of the Earth and they speak metaphorically. It's a language full of myth. So, it's not insulting about the leprechauns."

Yoshitomi explained how the leprechaun reflects the "punkishness" of the Irish. "The stereotype is quite good, it fits us."

In Ireland, St. Patrick's Day is not celebrated in the same manner as it is in America. It is merely what it originally was, a feast day for a saint.

John-William DeClaris, who has a web page dedicated to St. Patrick's Day, sees America's response to the holiday as the acceptance of those of Irish decent in the United States.

"In modern-day America, St. Patrick's Day is a day for Irish Americans to celebrate their ethnic background," said DeClaris. "There was once a day when the Irish were looked down upon by their fellow Americans.

"The average Irishman was a poor immigrant with low skills and even lower respect."

Yoshitomi agrees, saying that it grew out of the oppression of the Irish and as a means for them to prove to the United States that they were more than what people saw them as at the time.

"It's kind of like Cinco de Mayo," she said. "It was a way for them to say, 'We're here, we're American, let's have fun together.'" everything done," Brockington said.

E-BOARD

Last year, Nina Velasco was appointed E-Board chair in late March, two weeks before spring quarter. She was appointed after the previous chair, Edwin Rivera, resigned.

"This year I know the ins and outs of the job, and that'll help a lot," Brockington added.

Velasco agreed, saying that Brockington's experience should help him a lot.

"He was very committed (last year), and I'm sure he'll do a good job this year," she said.

Others, however, question the conditions under which Brockington was appointed. Dan Ruppel of the Bruin Republicans sees the late appointment, the lack of publicity and questions on the application as a deterrent to many who wanted to apply.

Ruppel claims that possible applicants from within the Bruin Republicans were deterred from applying by the lack of publicity and last-minute notification.

"The lack of publicity for the position didn't help us. They put two ads in the Bruin within a week of the application deadline. We just found out about it by accident," Ruppel said.

Ruppel also pointed to what he felt were awkward questions asked in the application. For instance, some of the questions asked on the application were "What are your favorite movies?" and "What is your favorite CD?"

"I don't know what these kind of questions have to do with choosing an election board chair," Ruppel said.

"I'm not questioning the candidate outright, but I do have to wonder about the application process," he said.

Addressing these charges, Brockington said that not everyone can be happy with the way the election process runs.

"You can't make everyone happy in the election process, but you have to be able to make the elections work, and work efficiently, being 100 percent fair all the time," he said.

Brockington also credited his late appointment to a busy student government, saying USAC was "doing many things for students' interests."

Currently, the E-Board is not full. Brockington hopes to make the appointments for remaining positions by Wednesday.

Applications were due last Friday for the positions of vice-chair, chair of investigations, chair of logistics and publicity chair.

"As long as you have a good team under you, things should flow pretty easily. Being the Election-Board chair isn't a one-person show," Velasco said.

Looking back at Brockington's record and performance as chair of investigations, Velasco approved of the decision to make Brockington election board chair.

"He's very objective. He's one person I could definitely see upholding the integrity of the election board," Velasco said.

"He can make controversial decisions, but more importantly he can make fair decisions," she continued.

laws.

Mark Kleiman, a professor in the School of Public Policy, explained that while some buyers' clubs are operated by people with a genuine commitment to helping sick people, they are still committing a felony under federal law. Therefore, state officials are acting accordingly in attacking the distributors.

"Buyers are buying the marijuana from large-scale illicit operators," Kleiman said. "They are feeding multimillion dollar criminal enterprises because there is no legal supply of it."

Kleiman said that marijuana probably does have valid medical uses, and that medical research should be done through normal clinical trials to prove cannabis' safety and effectiveness.

Then marijuana could be approved by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) and patients would be able to get marijuana at a local pharmacy, Kleiman explained.

"I just don't see anything in the text of the initiative that would allow the creation of the marijuana clubs," he added.

Actually, there has been some clinical work done. A study conducted by Dr. Thomas Ungerlei-der at UCLA on the medical uses of marijuana has showed significant uses.

"We did one study that showed delta 9 THC (the active compound in marijuana) worked in reducing nausea and vomiting in cancer patients receiving chemotherapy," Ungerlei-der said in a previous Daily Bruin article.

"We also did a pilot study that showed delta 9 THC reduces (muscle spasms) in patients suffering from multiple sclerosis," he added.

Bruin Libertarian President Justin Sobodash supports the right of marijuana clubs to distribute to needy patients as a result of its medical purposes.

"Being someone who has a sick grandmother, I want there to be a genuine commitment by Californians to legalize marijuana," Sobodash said.

And he is outraged that "sick people are not able to provide for their own medication."

Raj Joshi, fourth-year art student agrees with the distribution of marijuana but for different reasons.

"Marijuana should be legalized because its effects are much weaker than the consumption of alcoholic beverages," Joshi said.

"When smoking marijuana, one reaches a maximum high, whereas drinking excessively can lead to a loss of memory, a black out or ultimately passing out," he added.

Still, there are many students at UCLA who disagree with the distribution of marijuana in California.

"Research has been done and has concluded that marijuana use causes a chemical reaction in the brain that causes stress and anxiety," said Alejandra Aguirre, a first-year physiological science student.

"Enough evidence has been done to conclude that marijuana patients will soon become addicted, and regular dosage will not be enough to ease their pain. So it will lead to the use of stronger, more dangerous drugs," she added.

Regents' diversity plan holds promise

ADMISSIONS: Admitting top 4 percent from each high school sounds good, but details still sketchy

In an effort to maintain accessibility and diversity in the University of California, UC President Richard Atkinson recently drafted a proposal to offer college admissions to the top 4 percent of high-school seniors from each high school in California.

The plan has a lot of potential; it hopes to give students with limited academic resources an opportunity to compete for coveted spots in the university. But while the goals of the preliminary proposal are noble, the outcome will depend largely on several specific guidelines that have not yet been addressed.

The plan hopes to increase the diversity of the students attending the university by drawing students from more schools. The plan takes into account that not all high schools are on the same level with one another. For example, one high school may send 50 students to UCLA, while another may only send five. But that does not necessarily mean that students from the latter high school are of lesser merit than students from the former. Rather, the number of college-bound students is often a reflection of the resources each of the schools offers its students. These important resources may include college counselors, college preparatory courses, honors/AP grade inflation or other factors that may shape what the students actually learn.

The immense academic and environmental variation from school to school makes it difficult, if not impossible, to admit students based on uniform criteria that fail to take into account the different levels of performance students can extract from their given resources.

The problem is that the plan, which is still in its early stages, is unclear about how this idea can be implemented. Thus far, the proposal simply states that the top 4 percent of high-school students will be admitted into the UC. However it fails to address the different degrees of competitiveness in the admissions processes for each of the individual campuses. This clause is essential to the success of the plan. If students within the top 4 percent of their class automatically qualify for admission into the campus of their choice, the more competitive and popular campuses may be flooded with prospective students, while the lesser-known institutions may suffer from lack of interest.

Another issue the Regents will need to address is how schools will rank their students. While some high schools rank students taking into account AP and honors classes, others do not. In order for the plan to succeed, high schools must standardize the way high school GPAs are calculated.

Although the plan remains tentative and the very factors that will determine its success are not in place yet, the concept of broadening access to the university is a good one.

The potency of the plan is exciting, as it may give disadvantaged students the ability to compete with those who have the resources to maximize their academic growth in high school. It also gives hope to students who would otherwise not apply to the UC because they believe they cannot be competitive.

FINAL CONSPIRACIES

UCLA officials meet in secret, high up in Powell's bell tower, to find new ways in which to dominate the life of the student body

Spencer Hill

It's the end of the quarter now, and I'm sure you wish you studied, because your grades aren't very good. And I'm sure there are many of you who believe that your professors are conspiring against you.

You're right. They are.

I have talked to a secret informant with connections to the top, whose true identity is only known to my editor and me.

They have developed an intricate plan to subvert the UCLA population at large. The best way to expose them is by outlining their plan step-by-step, so you can see how they have started to take over your life. Soon, you'll have nothing left.

The first conspiracy involves the campus dining halls.

When we were conducting secret interviews investigating this matter, one student, who wishes to remain nameless, said innocently, "I remember when we had one week of good food in the dorms; since then the rest suck."

No question, there's a conspiracy against all the students living on campus. They give you good food, then they take it away. Next they'll take away the high-speed Internet connection, the cable TV and the free maid service.

Free maid service?

Yes, free maid service.

Don't you get free maid service? I do ... Oh, I'm sorry. I guess that's one more conspiracy against you.

And what about the Instructional Enhancement Fees? The web pages that you all know so well. Not only do these so-called "Instructional Enhancement Fees" make money, but they also have annoyed many students who see this as just another fee that they must pay.

And, what about all those people pushing stuff on Bruin Walk? Most of them don't even go to school here. They're employed by the UCLA mafia to keep you from getting to class on time, or least annoy you so you go insane.

Even the RAs are in on the conspiracy. You don't believe me, do you? You remember when you lived in the dorms, right? There you were, in your room, and the two rooms next to yours always played loud music late at night, right? The neighbors on one side love Metallica, and the others are really into the "Humpty Hump" and old MC Hammer albums. They're playing their music – you have your door open, and you're watching the TV quietly, but the RAs on duty decide that you're the one making the noise. When you ask them why they aren't asking the people next to you to turn down their music, they say, "They turned up their music because you had your TV up so loud that they couldn't hear their music, so they turned theirs up to drown out your TV."

Not only have they made the food bad, the RAs annoying and the fees arbitrary, the conspirators even strategically arranged the dorm

Media Assassins?

HIP-HOP: One day, journalists will face the reality that they can provoke deaths of stars

By Kevin Powell
University Wire

My phone began ringing at 5 a.m. It rang demandingly for another hour before I flipped over in bed and answered it: "The Notorious B.I.G. was shot dead in Los Angeles," a wailing voice – was it male or female? – said on the other end. Silence, a click, a dial tone. I thought someone was playing a very bad joke on me, especially since I still had jarring memories of being in Las Vegas on the day Tupac Shakur was pronounced dead. And especially since I had spent much of the previous two years covering the life and times of Tupac for Vibe and, in essence, covering The Notorious B.I.G., since Tupac had very publicly made Biggie his enemy.

But how could Biggie be dead, too? What had he done to deserve this? To be shot as he was leaving a party. On the eve of his new – album. Just as he was turning that corner where things are supposed to be, uh, better ... – Scribbled onto a legal pad on Sunday, March 9, 8:03 a.m.–

I could not not watch MTV's remembrance of The Notorious B.I.G. the other day. Consequently, I could not helping thinking about the fact that I, as a Vibe staff writer, had been in the middle of a storm that began in late 1994 when Tupac Shakur was shot five times in a New York City recording-studio's lobby area. Tupac would, via Vibe, brazenly implicate Biggie and his mentor Sean "Puffy" Combs. From there things would escalate out of control and Tupac, then Biggie, would be killed. By who I do not know, and if I did know I would not say in this space. Yeah, it is like that.

– End notepad scribbling. –

What I do know is that a certain guilt has followed me: a guilt born of the knowledge

Math integral to work, life

LOGIC: Respect students devoting lives to numbers to enhance your existence

By Lindsey Chen

Continuing its tradition of churning out opinions based on ignorance and screwed logic, the Daily Bruin Viewpoint section scored once again with Daniel Inlender's "It's time to look beyond the numbers" (Mar. 10). Last time, it was a white guy who thinks all whites are racists, now it's a science student who trivializes the importance of calculus.

Yes, Inlender, I'm a math student and no, I'm not going to make "derogatory comments" concerning your mother. Like you, I had an aversion to math when I was in grade school, and I agree with you that human worth and intelligence should not be quantified. But what igno-

View askew

Roee Ruttenberg's Viewpoint piece, "Rally serves as kickoff for election," (Mar. 12) is a perfect example of what happens when junior statesmen get fed too big a dose of movies like "Wag the Dog" and let their infantile imaginations run amok. For Ruttenberg, everything boils down to a conspiracy of partisan politics. He argues that USAC President Kandea Mosley and External Vice President Stacy Lee organized a demonstration against U.S. intervention in the Middle East and sanctions against the people of Iraq solely to promote their own political fortunes within student government.

Too bad Ruttenberg didn't detail how Mosley and Lee were able to pull off this conspiracy, for it would have made for a good "X-Files" episode. Here's my shot at it.

First, Mosley and Lee tricked Saddam Hussein into invading Kuwait. This was the toughest part, but the rest fell into place nicely. They convinced George Bush to start the Gulf War and to impose the deadly sanctions on Iraq. After 1,500,000 people had died due to the sanctions, and the United States was threatening to bomb Iraq, Mosley and Lee decided that they could finally use the issue to garner votes for Students First!

Perhaps it happened that way or maybe it just so happened that Mosley and Lee decided that student government could actually be used to draw attention to critical rance and ingratitude you displayed when you wrote, "We should be trying to produce people who are good at life, not just physics: People who are happy and don't shake in fear like an epileptic pig."

Perhaps you should think twice the next time you sip your cappuccino while surfing the Internet or fidget with all your cool new techno-gadgets. In case you don't know, some of those "stressed out, obsessive folks who ... eat Fig Newtons and do calculus problems for five hours" are the very people who make your life more convenient and enjoyable.

Instead of getting admiration for their patience in trying to understand and later applying their knowledge to real life, they get contempt from someone who thinks they're wasting their time doing mindless calculations. These people sit and study for hours because they actually care about learning the material.

You may find formulas, like F=ma, to be a bunch of meaningless letters, but to math students, these are powerful concepts that have a far-reaching impact on all natural phenomena. They are the ones who will be able to develop the technologies that you will take for granted. And for your information, a lot of them do know how to enjoy life and don't need you to remind them of that.

Since you're so fond of Benjamin Hoff's "The Tao of Pooh," here's a quote from its companion book, "The Te of Piglet": "Once you make a habit of Observing, Deducing and Applying you may sense a pathway opening up ahead of you – or inside of you, or both – leading to a deeper understanding of things." I think this truly describes the feeling that students get when they finally understand a math concept. They realize that what seems dull and meaningless at first is actually quite elegant and useful.

(Math students) are the ones who will be able to develop the technologies that you will take for granted.

Maybe instead of whining about tests in which "three hours of work is crammed into 43 minutes," you should try to sit down and spend more time learning the stuff. By the way, if you really are interested in Taoism, I suggest that you read the original text and not just the Cliff's Notes version of it. Like you said, "you have to figure out things in life on your own, for yourself."

"But isn't the knowledge that comes from experience more valuable than the knowledge that doesn't?" Well, that's true only to a certain degree. If you're referring to personal experiences such as dealing with the loss of a loved one, then I agree this kind of experience is more valuable if experienced firsthand rather than merely reading about it in literature. However, scientific knowledge must precede experience in order to make it possible.

For example, pre-med students spend hours memorizing the names of body parts not because they prefer cramming all those Latin words in their brain over going out and "experiencing life," but because they'll know what to look for when someone tells them to "cm the corpus callosum."

Similarly, one must be proficient in the language of calculus in order to participate in a research experience program in say, fluid mechanics or sound waves.

See CHEN, page 25

That mathematical research will be important in the next century is an undeniable truth. Research on number theory or, if you prefer, "knowledge for the sake of numbers," continues to lend insight to the field of computer science.

Furthermore, differential equations provide powerful tools for scientists and engineers studying dynamical systems. Thus, to trivialize the importance of calculus and to say that "there's definitely something wrong with (numbers') paramount importance in our educational system" is to mock the foundation by which advanced civilization is based upon.

What we do get from the study of mathematics is an appreciation for its sheer logic ... and in essence, for life.

I admit that most of the math students, like myself, will probably never use Fourier series or contour integrals after we graduate and thereby have wasted all those time doing pages of long and boring problem sets.

But what we do get from the study of mathematics is an appreciation for its sheer logic, for its contribution to other sciences, for its advancement to humanity, and in essence, for life.

Oh, Mr. Inlender, you had such good intentions. But all you had in your column was a great thesis ("There are no formulas that can solve life's problems") and nothing else to support it. Instead, you decided to trash your fellow South-campus neighbor.

As for your suggestion, no, it is not my kind who need to look beyond numbers. That is the goal of all math students. Rather, it is you who need to look beyond numbers in order to discover its simple beauty and wide-range of applicability. As your venerable Lao Tze suggested, "See simplicity in complexity," (You did read the whole book, didn't you?).

On a final note, I would just like to say this: Mr. Inlender, you may know your psychology and biology forward and backward, but if you still think that calculus is a book full of meaningless scribble, then your bachelor's degree in psychobio is going to be literally just that because you do not truly understand what science is about.

You remember how Pavlovian conditioning works, right? Pavlov was working in his labs and he discovered that when he would feed the dogs he was "studying," they would salivate before they got their food. Being fed was linked to their mouths watering. So, Pavlov decided to screw around a little, because that's what you can do when you have a doctorate. In his experiments, he decided to ring a bell every time he fed the dogs. After an extended period of time, the ring of the bell became linked with the dogs salivating. So now if he rings the bell, the dog's mouth waters even though there's no food.

So what does this have to do with you? When you lived in the dorms, most of you had your desk next to your bed. (Those of you who are smart will change this arrangement once you read this.)

You're sitting at your desk reading. But the chairs in the dorms are very uncomfortable and very hard to sit on. So you look over at your soft bed – wait, excuse me, less-hard bed – right next to the desk and you sit down to read.

But because your body is conditioned to think that it's supposed to sleep when it's on the bed, you doze off. Now, every time you sit down to read you fall asleep. Your bed is better than the chair, so the pattern continues. Read a book on your bed; fall asleep. Read a book on your bed; fall asleep.

After a while, your body gets used to this, so you don't need the bed anymore, because reading is now linked with sleeping.

Now, anywhere you sit down to read, you fall asleep, and you flunk out of school.

This is no accident.

They are out to get you. They know all about you.

They even have files. Yes, files.

You see the UCLA syndicate meets high above us all in the top of Powell Library with complete control over your life. (And, you thought that was bell tower.) They have files on each you. Everything that you've ever done, they know about. And, they have a special row of cabinets filled with many secrets that have been kept from the UCLA student body. Between the Kennedy assassination file and the UFO/Area-51 file are the secret blueprints and strategies that they use to control UCLA (and college students in general) from on high. In one section of these plans, they detail their secret labyrinth of tunnels in the hills of the UCLA campus. You know, of course, the campus was originally flat. But when they began building, they decided in secret that they should build a complex system of tunnels and underground building complexes.

So they met, developing their plans for world domination. (And, you thought all the construction was for "seismic restructuring" or to "build a parking structure.") And, all the little annoyances have been planned purposely to keep them from being discovered and to keep you preoccupied. They hope that if you worry about your petty little problems, you will go crazy and overlook their master plan: total domination.

POWELL

that we in the media (Vibe, The Source, MTV, BET and any and everyone else you can think of) helped to shape – due to haste, poor judgment, and a greed for magazine sales and TV ratings – the tension between Tupac and Biggie, which became the tension between Bad Boy Entertainment and Death Row Records, which became the East Coast versus West Coast "beef."

And the fans of Hip-hop were not that far behind ...

When the '90s ends, I think many of us are going to have to really look at ourselves, and ask ourselves as journalists, music fans and thinking human beings, "How did I contribute to the turmoil so closely associated with my youth? With my generation? With me?"

Each of us who participates ... has blood on our hands.

Casual and/or outside observers will probably dismiss this argument and say, tongue-in-cheek, that the rappers' art was imitating life anyway, and "If you live by the sword, you die by the sword."

Oh, but what a naive assessment that is, for only a fool would criticize that which he or she does not know. Just like it would be foolish for me to dismiss Kurt Cobain's suicide and Elvis Presley's demise and not take into account how much their working-class backgrounds, their struggles with fame, identity and drugs all contributed to their deaths. There is, finally, a context for everything.

As I watched The Notorious B.I.G.'s old videos, the vintage backstage interviews and his verbal acumen on stage, I cried because it was evident that he had been a dreamer his entire life, that he was, in fact, fulfilling a dream, and it was the fulfillment of that dream that had led to his death, in ways most of us will never know. Or could ever fathom.

On the tribute cover to The Notorious B.I.G., Vibe asked, "When will it end?" or something to that effect.

I laughed when I saw that, not because death is funny, but because each of us who participates in the madness has blood on our hands.

And it will only end when we want it to end.

And not a moment sooner.

(Rest in peace, Biggie, and keep representin' Brooklyn, wherever you are.)

issues facing our society. Obviously, Ruttenberg would rather spend all of his time drawing up petty grievances against USAC as if he's preparing himself to be the next Newt Gingrich. Forget about the real world and humanity; there are games to be played and schemes to be hatched in Kerckhoff Hall.

Mosley and Lee should be commended for showing the courage to take a public stand demanding that the sanctions be lifted. Let's examine Ruttenberg's so-called more informed position on one of the most important issues facing our civilization. He says, "I am not saying that I am in support of sanctions on Iraq, nor am I saying the opposite." Is this the type of hold political leadership Ruttenberg would like to bring to USAC?

Flutist's life perspective carries into concert work

MUSIC: Family, practice, experience allow Galway to express pure emotion

By Ai Goldsmith
Daily Bruin Contributor

James Galway may be a personality you've already met: in an elevator, a local mall, a doctor's office or a concert hall.

On March 28th, joined by the Tokyo String Quartet, Galway performs at the Veterans Wadsworth Theater, showing everyone his personality – his music.

"James Galway is a terrific flute player and has a terrific charisma," says longtime friend, colleague and UCLA faculty member David Shostac.

But Galway, who has tremendous love and dedication to music, explains that success takes time, hard work and some heartaches.

"There's a lot of disappointment along the road but you just keep logging away at it and you do what you can," Galway says. "In my opinion, what you have to do is to refresh your ideas every day and see what you can do to improve your interpretation, the way you play your flute and learn something new. Study something: listen a new piece of music everyday."

This attitude isn't lost on his colleagues.

> "Galway is easy-going and very spontaneous,"
> Kikuei Ikeda
> Violinist

"Galway is (also) easy-going and very spontaneous," says Kikuei Ikeda, the second violinist for the Tokyo String Quartet. "He's also very funny. He loves to tell jokes."

Ikeda recalls that once, during their last tour together, Galway began playing the Mozart Quartet in D major in a different key. Yet, knowing that humor is the best remedy, Galway turned it into a joke.

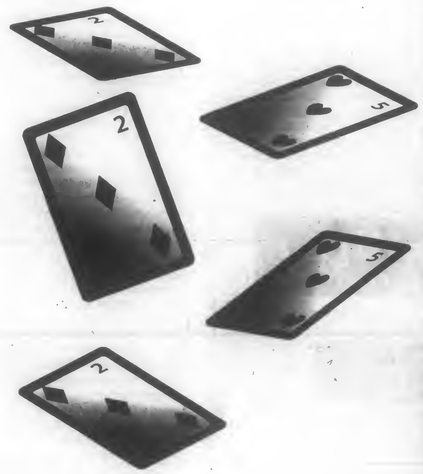
Penn and Teller's sly humor wows audiences as much as their sleight-of-hand magic tricks



Penn and Teller come to Wilshire Theater for two weeks starting March 25.

Daily Bruin Contributor

The phone rings at 10:30 a.m. A masculine voice introduces himself and casually remarks, "I just got out of the swimming pool and now I'm sitting here naked and dripping – great way to do an interview."

Half an hour later, the phone rings again and another masculine voice mimics a pretend dialogue, "'I've always dreamed of flying.' 'Well good, so have we, now shut up!' 'And if I could fly, this is what it would look like.' 'No it wouldn't, now shut up!'"

No, this is not a bonus from the obscene, schizophrenic phone-callers-of-the-month club. It's just a taste of the quirky, honest and sarcasm-laden humor of the renowned duo, Penn and Teller.

Appearing in Los Angeles for the first time in over seven years, Penn and Teller will play a two-week engagement at the Wilshire Theater. The show runs March 25 through April 5, with one lower-priced preview performance on March 24.

Although Teller is the silent partner on stage, when he does decide to speak he certainly makes just as powerful an impact as Penn. After all, its not every day that a star confesses to being naked and wet on the other end of the phone line. Then again, there isn't much Penn and Teller do that is normal.

When performing, Teller prefers the challenge of lying without speaking and still making the audience jump to the conclusions he wants them to jump to. Penn becomes the sole voice for the duo, lacing the show with his unique brand of insight and cynicism.

Penn and Teller use unusual humor and magic tricks to entertain their audiences.

"On my own, I don't think I ever would have thought to do the kind of talk Penn does, which is, in its way, wildly political, although it isn't politically topical. He doesn't make White House sexual harassment jokes," says Teller. "It's more broadly political than that. It's a sort of witty, sharp, surprising, it's not even really commentary. It's a very sort of elusive thing to describe, its these sort of explosions that make you think."

Between Penn's politics, Teller's silent lies and the bunny rabbits jumping into chipper shredders, the needle-swallowing, barehanded broken bottle juggling and 1404 pounds of playing cards being manipulated with forklifts to perform the world's heaviest card trick don't seem excessively out of the ordinary.

"Unreassuring is certainly characteristic of our style. I mean, the last TV special we did, we left me dead in the water tank and ended the show," Teller says.

In a similar fashion, Penn and Teller never bring the bunny rabbit back alive after it jumps into the chipper shredder. The audience just has to have faith they didn't actually kill it.

"We just sort of shrug and go 'oh, too bad' and then we move on with the show without ever commenting," Teller says.

There really isn't any clear-cut way to define and classify what it is that Penn and Teller actually do. The Obie award they received while they were on Broadway was addressed "To Penn and Teller, for whatever it's called that they do."

Some practical pointers for a procrastinating paper writer

COLUMN: Ace your finals, work out and deep clean the apartment all at once

Vanessa Vanderzanden

As a third-year junior, I feel I am at liberty to divulge certain secrets as to the best ways to study for the upcoming finals and term papers. First, wait until everyone leaves the house. (This may be difficult, but if you're lucky like me, all your roommates will decide to leave town on the same weekend.) Then, pop in some Bob Dylan or Roger Waters's solo work; the stuff your roommates wouldn't be interested in having on as background music. But they're gone so ha. You get to play.

Then, clean the kitchen. Start by putting away all the dishes that have been drying. Then do the two counters full of dirty dishes. Then pick up the dishes in the other room. All the while, be singing along with Bob about how the sun's not yellow, it's chicken. Agree with him that you don't want to be an old maid at 22, married to your job. Ponder that as you simultaneously contemplate beginning research on your 12-page Hemingway-Fitzgerald paper. Realize you need to clean more.

Clear all of the trash out of the living room. This includes empty beer cans, the contents of which you helped to consume last night in another effort to prepare for your paper. Good work. Congratulate yourself. Getting hammered with your friends is an excellent way to ease your mind into thinking about the role World War I had on young Ernest.

Now take that drooping streamer and reattach it. Good. If that weren't properly in place, there would be no chance of you managing to plan out your paper. I mean, if you can't even maintain order in your living room how the hell can you expect to arrange your thoughts on your paper? Christ, get it together. This is important.

Now deal with the recycling bins and mop the floor. It may not seem dirty, but you know this is an essential step in proper paper preparation. Good. Keep singing at the top of your lungs as you move that mop or else you may begin to mentally organize your work schedule for next week. Bad. Repeat after me: "I'm goin' out to California, where I was born, and hardly raised." That's our man Bob. We sing with him. No more thinking about you. Become one with Bob. He is your voice and yours is his. His words are all about you. Good.

However, don't go joining any cults. This is purely for educational purposes. The pre-paper writing phase, you understand.

Don't forget that your roommate bought Easter decorations that look like wire barbed with plastic bunnies.

THE DIN PEDALS
"The Din Pedals"

The Din Pedals, "The Din Pedals", (Epic) Hailing from San Luis Obispo and fresh from conquering the L.A. club scene, the Din Pedals have said goodbye to their indie days and released their major-label debut, which, simply put, rocks.

This fresh foursome takes an unflashy, contemporary guitar sound, sans all the loops and electronic beats, and gives it raw passion and life. The Din Pedals create charged, well-crafted melodies that easily compare to such vital alternative bands as Radiohead and Live. One can even hear early U2 and Nirvana in areas.

Most of this comes from the evident talents of guitarist Harrison's skilled riffwork and lead singer James Grundler's soaring vocals, which sound a lot like those of Radiohead's Thom Yorke and Brit- band Marion's Jamie Harding. Their combined talents on every track make for some of the most moving and engaging music in rock today.

The first single and new KROQ add-on, "Ashtray," reflects a lot of the album's darkness and bleakness, but there's something exciting about the proclamatory chorus ("I'm coming back in all / I'm counting on the ashtray") and throbbing rhythms that contradict the melancholy themes. Leadoff track "Kangaroo Kourt," "Downtown Sister" and "Not Much For Saturdays" have the same powerful effect.

But plenty of slower, anguished tunes balance out the rockers, and do so quite beautifully. The dependency-themed "Emotional Drugs" haunts and cries out with beautiful ache. "Porn Star" and "Waterfall" also emote a tender yet confident power which makes the listener drop everything and just listen in awe. The lyrics, while usually ambiguous and enigmatic, deliver images of Prozac-riddled confusion and troubled relationships of all sorts (like in "Ashtray") befitting the darker music. And Grundler's stellar vocals certainly do the words justice.

The Din Pedals have crafted some extremely impressive and effective rock 'n' roll. If radio and subsequent record buyers embrace this resonating record, the Din Pedals could offer the dying American rock scene a little more life. Mike Prevatt A

Two, "Voyeurs" (Nothing) He's angry. His head's full of poetry that he can't express. But he's got a lot of expensive toys to bang on, so he figures it will be OK. In this way, Two, a shiny, cue-ball-headed guy with a fu-manchu, manages to channel his wealth of bitterness through electronified sound. What results is a combination between the poignant, isolatory feelings of Nine Inch Nails, the harsh, misunderstood wails of Tool and the cock-metal guitar riffs of Alice in Chains.

However, though Two clearly understands what's necessary for creating a growling fan base of disenchanted, restless teenage boys, it seems unlikely that his sinister screeches will affect many of the college set. While he maneuvers well within the confines of a genre which embraces grumbly, guttural bass work and monotonous, pissed-off drum beats, Two fails to shed any new light on the industrial/grunge music scene.

Still, "Voyeurs" would provide a sense of solace on particularly ruthless days, when you're just fed up with everything. However, if you've just experienced a sunny, kick-back morning listening to Chris Isaak croon, "I believe in a beautiful day" and you've been sold, saying, "Me too! Me too!," and then spent your evening listening to your neighbor's Rush albums, deciding, "Hey, they're not that bad," getting sucked into their expansive melodies and almost fairy-tale lyrics, Two's "Voyeurs" wouldn't be the best CD to pop in. But maybe all that sweetness and beauty's been grating on you. Go figure. Vanessa VanderZanden C+

Pure, "Feverish" (Mammoth) Don't you hate it when an album lets you down? You love track one, dig track two, chill to three and then all the rest leave you thinking, "What the hell just happened?" Enter Canadian band Pure's new album, "Feverish." A couple of really good songs comprise the total of their capabilities, with fast rhythms and dancing beats, but the album as a whole limps its way through every remaining song.

Two noteworthy songs save the album from total ruin. "Chocolate Bar" mixes techno grooves and electric madness through even better deals in the chorus. "Feverish" swims through smooth mellow vocals and heavy melodies. The song, however, serves to show lead-singer Jody Birch's own sex appeal more than anything else.

Other songs prove hilarious, but not hilarious in a good way. "Sunshine and Happy Hour" sounds almost like a pop-y Brady Bunch cheese-fest but it's even worse. Imagine a Brady Bunch reunion with a drunk Peter Brady at the mic and turntables. Not pretty stuff.

Pure fans beware: this won't be the album of your dreams. Michelle Zubiate C-

Various Artists, Music from and inspired by the Motion Picture "The Player's Club" (A&M). Warning: this album is not to be played in polite company. If you wanna see some rumps shakin', go out and see "The Player's Club," Ice Cube's new movie about life in a strip club. If you wanna hear about the same thing then go get the soundtrack. This is the perfect album for those who haven't had their fix of trite metaphors and references to sex. If that's what you want, then let the clubbin' begin!

The album starts off slammin' with the first two tracks, both by Ice Cube: "We Be Clubbin'" and its remix featuring DMX. As one of hip-hop's most anticipated new artists, DMX, known for his growling lyrical delivery, turns an otherwise mediocre joint into a sure-to-be bona-fide hit.

Representing the East Coast is Jay-Z, with the hustler-turned-player jam "From Marcy to Hollywood." Master P and Ice Cube team up to pay respects to the old-school with an X-rated remake of the Whoudini classic, "You Know I'm A Ho." The various R&B tracks laid down by the likes of Changing Faces, Brownstone and Mr. Dalvin (one-fourth of Jodeci) provide a little cross-genre flavor to an otherwise solidly hip-hop album.

With the exception of a few songs, "Players Club" is essentially about sex, sex and mo' sex, and that's it. It seems that entire albums dedicated to this theme would have gotten played-out a long time ago, but perhaps not. If butts and breasts are your idea of a good time, then "The Player's Club" is where its at. If not, then don't waste your time. J. Jioni Palmer C

Students interested in working in television production

Student Media UCLA is looking for students with an interest and some experience in television production to volunteer as studio technicians who will support a student-produced and directed cable television news broadcast. Positions we seek to fill include technical director, audio technician, camera operators, floor director, teleprompter operator, and tape operator. Interested students would preferably have some experience with videotape editing. We provide training.

'Post Coitum' addresses a persistent cultural taboo

FILM: Roüan wrote, directed exploration of dangerous fairy-tale love between older women, younger men

By Michelle Nguyen
Daily Bruin Contributor

Filmmaker Brigitte Roüan went to America six years ago and was struck by the phenomenon of older women dating young men. She figured America was always six years ahead of France, but this time she was mistaken.

"When I came back to Paris I made inquiries about this and I discovered that French girls copy the American girls, but they were hiding themselves because it was still a taboo," Roüan says as she sits in her hotel suite smoking the petite Capris that match her petite, confident stature.

> "There are a lot of charming princes but nobody is ... perfect."
> Brigitte Roüan
> Filmmaker

This observation provided the byline that would cause problems for the two lovers in the new film "Post Coitum" which Roüan wrote, directed and starred in.

"I took from America the story of the age difference because I wanted a handicap to that love story, a handicap to that patient," Roüan says.

The love patient in the film, played by Roüan herself, is Diane Clovier, a 40-year-old book editor who leads a nice mediocre life consisting of a husband and two children. In comes Emilio (Boris Terral), a young strapping lad who has her dropping her baggage of banality to run free with passion.

The problem of their age difference is readily apparent. The tide turns when Diane and Emilio go to visit his grandfather, who asks Boris if he is planning to start a family with this older woman.

Diane herself encounters self-doubt about her age. There is a moving scene where she stands naked in front of the mirror to evaluate herself, smoothing over the fine wrinkles and looser skin that make her feel ugly.

"The day we had to shoot that scene I nearly cut it," Roüan says. "I was so moved and troubled to do it that in front of the mirror while they were preparing the shoot I nearly cried, and I said I don't want to cry in front of all my crew."

But she did not cut the scene because she realized that as a director she would have made any other actress do the scene.

The strong traditions of impossible love in the French literature of Molière, Racine and Corneille influenced Roüan to add a handicap to the relationship between Diane and Boris. She is interested in the idea that people in Western cultures do not ever believe that a love is fated to die.

"In Asia it's quite different. Marriage, weddings have nothing to do with love. It's an arrangement," Roüan says. "But the poison of love is an accident. The poison of love is when you are a little girl they told you fairy tales like "Sleeping Beauty." As you are a girl you are told there is one single Prince Charming for you in the world, which is stupid and false because there are a lot of charming princes but nobody is absolutely perfect."

Even Roüan admits that the shell of the storyline might sound trite, but the courage and controversy that dots her films had producers running away from this film. One critic thought the film might be immoral because of the wild abandon that marks Diane's relationship with Emilio, especially when Diane has to deal with the aftershock of Emilio leaving her.

Roüan is sympathetic to her character's spiral downward into depression which leads her to abandon her family.

"If she had cancer nobody would have said she left her kids," Roüan explains. "She had a nervous break-

Group performs folk, jazz medley in perfect harmony

MUSIC: UCLA student sings, writes songs with relaxed band of friends

By Trinh Bui
Daily Bruin Contributor

The dream of becoming the next big thing started Thursday for music group Collective Harmony when they took the Westwood Plaza stage. Playing together for the last two months, this jazz/folk outfit pieced together a capable coming-out party with enthusiastic melodies.

Performing a musical style rarely heard around the Southland, Harmony fuses folk with improvisational-privy jazz. The result is a sonic patchwork quilt emphasizing folk's honest lyrics and jazz's emotionally centered music.

Harmony's birth is a story in itself; Jenni Alpert, lead singer and songwriter, scoured the UCLA campus for anyone willing to play her music. Alpert's goal was to bridge two technically different music formats into a hybrid style.

"I just wanted to fuse together folk, which is a standard structure style, with something improvisational and nonstandard, like jazz," Alpert says. "Putting them together creates new tunes that meld the harmonies of jazz and folk. I know bands have tried this before, but it is such a beautiful tune that I had to try and create."

A jazz vocal major, Alpert had been soloing her songs and spoken-word pieces in coffee shops for the past three years. Now with a band, Alpert and company plan on producing an album and gigging more coffee shops.

So far, Alpert handles every aspect, from writing the songs to promoting and booking the band. It has given her a first-hand look at all the difficulties involved with running a band. A self-admitted stage junkie, Alpert can't imagine herself doing anything else but performing.

"I am a performer," Alpert states. "I don't have a choice. I just want to perform and not necessarily make money or become famous but just influence people with my music."

Her music is a collection of melodies that are improvised by the other members of the band. Over the changes, bassist John Clasic, percussionist Saler Saleh, guitarist Tim Oleary, sax man Chris Young, trumpeter Danny Larvin and violist Marla Littleton add their own interpretations to Harmony's songs.

The most difficult instrument to incorporate into jazz format has been the viola. Littleton is encouraged by her progress in bringing string instruments into pop music.

> "I write songs about the people I meet, the situations that I have been in or observed,"
> Jenni Alpert
> Lead singer

"Ninety-nine percent of string instruments are played through sheet music," Littleton says. "It is unheard of to improvise string arrangements, like what we do in Harmony. It has been more difficult than I thought it would be to change over, but I really want get rid of the mentality that strings can't be incorporated into jazz."

Littleton's improvement in freestyle strumming is a testament to the group's growing bond. They have become a tight band, realizing the talent and creativity that each member contributes. The unity and nurturing nature of the band facilitates the on-stage improv.

"Our friendship definitely relaxes the atmosphere, for me, at least," Littleton says. "I know all the guys just want to help me with the music. We are very comfortable around each other, and it helps onstage. It is like we're on the same wavelength ... everything clicks."

The on-stage comfort level was apparent during their hour-long session Thursday afternoon at Westwood Plaza. They started the show with a cool set ditty; the horns blared mellowing grooves over Alpert's trained vocals.

Harmony's sound is reminiscent of the Indigo Girls and Ella Fitzgerald; a Grateful Dead/Phish atmosphere permeated from the band as well. Casual was the word as a band member who was not performing a particular song chilled and enjoyed the music with the other UCLA students seated directly on stage.

Collective Harmony paced their beats well, never overexaggerating sections of the song. The structure allowed for jamming that fit into the general intent of each song and demonstrated a mature level of execution. "Honest Smile" was a pop-y number with bits and pieces of Joni Mitchell eking out between the chorus. Alpert admits her influence from folk singers but balks at the notion she is representing the femforce.

"I write songs about the people I meet, the situations that I have been in or observed," Alpert says. "The feminist movement in some respect annoys me, but I admire the people that can write about issues facing women."

Collective Harmony worked through a set of tunes Thursday afternoon, showcasing the musical range that is blossoming within this group. They're still lacking a unique sound that will separate them from other folk/jazz bands, and trip up sometimes in the flow of the music. Yet there is potential, and Collective Harmony, with its displays of brilliance, will surely aim to evolve into a band that lives up to its enthusiasm.

East West finds direction with new home

THEATER: Troop hopes its move downtown will attract larger audiences

By Reed Johnson
Los Angeles Daily News

"I hope you're not afraid of heights," Tim Dang says mischievously as he dashes onto a catwalk 20 feet in the air.

Below him, coated with a thin layer of construction dust, is the David Henry Hwang Theatre, new home of East West Players – the nation's oldest and arguably most influential Asian-American theater company.

It is three weeks before East West officially christens the 220-seat theater, the centerpiece of the city-owned Union Center for the Arts, which East West will share with two other non-profits: L.A. Artcore, an arts exhibitor and arts quarterly publisher; and Visual Communications, which assists independent film and video makers and maintains one of the nation's largest archives of Pan-Asian images.

El Niño has slowed workers putting the final touches on the building, making it necessary to push back opening night for East West's inaugural production. The group will perform the Stephen Sondheim-John Weidman musical "Pacific Overtures."

But Dang, East West's upbeat artistic director, is already pumped up about his company's high-profile address, smack in the middle of Little Tokyo and flanked by the Museum of Contemporary Art's Geffen Contemporary and the Japanese American National Museum.

"I can't wait until it's all lit up at night," Dang says, referring to the arts center's 18-foot-tall marquee. "I wonder if you can see it from Bunker Hill."

It's a question steeped in symbolism, because at age 32, East West suddenly finds itself keeping company with downtown's heavy hitters: banks, hotels, corporate offices, museums, the L.A. Philharmonic, the Mark Taper Forum and the Ahmanson Theatre.

Its new location suggests that East West no longer will be quite the same scrappy company that, since 1965, has done business out of a funky 99-seat space in the bohemian Silver Lake district. In making the leap downtown, East West joins a small group of L.A. theater companies that have upgraded to mid-size homes, enabling them to mount more expensive, ambitious productions.

The change in status brings new opportunities – and subtle new pressures.

"It makes a difference in the way we're perceived by the community," says Dang.

Even before its latest makeover, East West had been undergoing a slow transition from an overachieving, seat-of-the-pants ensemble to a prominent cross-cultural institution with an annual budget expected to double to $1 million during the next few years.

Founded by an ethnically diverse group of young artists, including

'Nightline' parody features non-political news comedy

TV: Saturday Night Live alum's sitcom appeals to both political gurus, idiots

By Lynn Elber
The Associated Press

Al Franken, who gave us the book "Rush Limbaugh is a Big, Fat Idiot and Other Observations," insists that "Lateline," his new NBC sitcom, isn't political.

Yes, the series, loosely based on ABC's "Nightline," is set in Washington. Yes, a number of political figures including Congressmen Richard Gephardt and Barney Frank and Watergate burglar G. Gordon Liddy make appearances.

Franken says he wants "Lateline" to be a classic, character-based sitcom, not a political-science lesson.

"I hate liberal TV shows. I hate when shows say they're liberal," he said. "They usually don't do it well. Also, when comedy shows proselytize they're usually not funny.

"If anybody takes it on the chin in this show it's probably the media ... But I don't think it's appropriate for this show to be about my political values," Franken said.

The comedy, which debuts 9:30 p.m. EST Tuesday on NBC, stars Franken as the earnest and painfully untelegenic Al Freundlich. He's a "Lateline" correspondent who longs to be king – read "anchorman" – while carrying the flame of journalistic integrity.

That glamour spot is filled by Pearce McKenzie (Robert Foxworth), who has the requisite combination of polished air, voice and arrogance. He's not a Ted Koppel parody, says John Markus, who created and produces the show along with Franken.

"Our anchor is an amalgam of many anchors. He's venal. He's elegant in the way that James Bond is elegant," said Markus.

Also part of the newsroom landscape are Miguel Ferrer, as the savvy producer in charge of "Lateline," and Megyn Price, as the patient producer

Everyone's hitting the bottle in DiCillo's 'The Real Blonde'

FILM: Satire skewers shallow obsessions with appearance, superficiality

By Jay Carr
The Boston Globe

Tom DiCillo's "The Real Blonde" is one of the cleverer comedies of the season, partly because DiCillo makes it look easier to bring off than it actually is. Essentially, it's a light-handed satire of shallowness, set in a Manhattan where everybody is a performer, or wants to be. The film runs on the anxious energies of young careerists throwing themselves at appearance-driven trades – acting, modeling, or making music videos. Blondness – or the lack of it – becomes the touchstone for honesty or reality.

The relationship of its leading couple is solid enough, although they don't think so. At 35, Matthew Modine's actor, Joe, spends his free time polishing his audition piece – Biff's monologue from Arthur Miller's "Death of a Salesman" – but hasn't got much to show for it. Catherine Keener's Mary pays most of the bills with her job as a makeup artist working fashion shoots, blaming herself for the staleness that has overtaken their relationship; she is angry and vaguely guilty about wishing Joe would come down from his high standards and audition for something blatantly commercial.

Joe's glumness lifts when he meets Elizabeth Berkley's receptive fellow actor. Meanwhile, Mary starts working out her resentment in a self-defense class, oblivious at first to the extra attention being paid her by her shrink, played by Buck Henry. As Joe and Mary cope with their respective temptations, Joe's acquaintance, Maxwell Caulfield's strutting fellow thespian, lands a role on a soap. He starts making time with his co-star, Daryl Hannah's Kelly, dumping Bridgette Wilson's blonde model Sahara, with whom he had been sleeping noncommittally.

The circle is completed when Mary helps Sahara get through a shoot that enables DiCillo to skewer the glam fashion world with its sexless sexiness and pseudo-kinkiness. A lot of what follows hinges on this or that character discovering who's a bottle blonde. But it isn't only the world of shallow appearances that DiCillo nails in his gentle satiric set pieces. He's just as funny in a restaurant scene in which diners mouth nonsense about a popular Italian art film, and funniest of all in a Holocaust revisionism scene on a music video soundstage.

DiCillo isn't really out to draw blood, though, and the proof of it is that he makes the bottle blondes sweet at heart. He refrains from twisting the knife even when he has Wilson's supermodel offer that she's really into "The Little Mermaid" as proof of her essential spirituality. What the film lacks in incisiveness and pace, it more than makes up for in edgy energies and a last-minute ability to draw back and thumb its nose at the stuff it's almost seduced by – including, of course, self-importance.

EAST WEST

the legendary Mako (East West's artistic director until 1989) and actress Beulah Quo, the company was multicultural long before "multiculturalism" became a buzz word.

Throughout its first three decades, East West favored a yin-yang diet of Broadway musicals, new interpretations of European classics (including a "Hedda Gabler" set in Japan) and contemporary works by Asian-American dramatists such as David Henry Hwang and Philip Kan Gotanda. John Lone, Amy Hill and Sab Shimono are among the actors who have performed there.

East West's new location could help build bridges between Little Tokyo and downtown's other cultural archipelagoes, says Erich Nakano of Little Tokyo Service Center, the development company that supervised the $3.4 million Union Center renovation and earthquake retrofit.

"There's a projected 40,000-plus patrons who will be visiting the theater alone on an annual basis," Nakano says.

When the Hawaiian-born Dang first came to East West in 1980, he was, in his own words, "this snotty-nosed kid from USC" out to "conquer the world." Mako, upon meeting Dang, promptly called him "a banana – yellow on the outside, white on the inside," meaning that Dang's cultural perspective rested squarely on European traditions.

Eighteen years later, Dang is a suave and seasoned cultural diplomat who's not afraid to use East West to raise sensitive subjects.

He sees the controversy over the musical "Miss Saigon" as a watershed and a mixed blessing for Asian-American theater artists. Although a non-Asian American actor ultimately was cast in the crucial role of the Engineer, the experience taught Dang that the only way for Asian-Americans to assert creative control is to own their own theaters and create their own plays.

In upcoming seasons he wants to present a play about the Imperial Japanese Army's enslavement of Korean women as concubines during World War II, and another work about Vincent Chin, a Chinese-American murdered in 1982 by a disgruntled Detroit ex-auto worker who mistook him for a Japanese-American.

"The Asians are always seen as very nice people who don't complain and would rather be quiet. I think it's time we had a stake in the community. I think it's important that we do more than just act," Dang says.

Nonetheless, he says, "East West has to make a name for itself in the community before it can do some things that push buttons in the community."

Judging by its recent capital-endowment fund-raising campaign, which raised $1.72 million, the city's various Asian constituencies need no introduction to East West

"We discovered that we had a unique base," says fund-raising co-chair George Takei, Mr. Sulu of TV's "Star Trek" and a long-time East West supporter.

"Asian Americans now have been successful in different arenas, in the areas of engineering, finance and so forth. We were able to appeal to not just their generosity but their pride in achievement. We were able to raise funds from all Asian groups."

Dang believes that "Pacific Overtures," which deals with Commodore Perry's aggressive opening of U.S. trade with Japan in 1853, is an especially fitting choice for East West at this time.

"There are a lot of themes about Japanese learning from the West and taking it and making it better. That's kind of like East West Players. We've been here for 30 years and learned from the community, and now we want to help lead the L.A. theater community."

Which may be another way of saying that Tim Dang and company aren't afraid of heights.

down so she has a right to leave the children. She is ill."

But the finished product brought about much critical acclaim in France, receiving praise for its bold approach to love.

Unlike her previous film, "Overseas," which sparked a good deal of political debate, "Post Coitum" seems to tempt confession. Roüan received many letters from older women and young men who wanted to talk about the futile relationships they had been in.

The film's full title in France, "Post Coitum Animal Triste" which is taken from the Roman poet Ovid to mean "after sex, the animal is sad," was a good choice for Roüan because it spoke of how painful passion can be and how stupid it can make you. And the passion that drives Diane's pain is preceded by the passion "durante coitum."

"Usually I think if you put sex in movies it's boring because from south to north to east to west, everybody makes love similarly," Roüan says. "If you put sex on the screen, what happens? You put two actors in a bed, you spray Evian on their face to make sweat and that's it. It's gymnastic, which is boring."

> "If you put sex in movies ... it's gymnastic, which is boring."
> Brigitte Roüan
> Filmmaker

The love scenes were shot to highlight the differences in age between the two naked bodies.

She continues, "Each scene we had sex we tried to have an intention behind it and we discussed it with Boris and with the husband, in terms of lines or in terms of emotion or in terms of fear, in terms of pleasure."

But Roüan did not intentionally put punch in the love scenes to make the story bolder or more controversial.

"I didn't decide to make an erotic scene," Roüan explains. "It's like grace. You don't choose to have grace. You have or you have not. It's a result."

FILM: "Post Coitum" opens Friday.

LATELINE

in charge of Freundlich.

To steep themselves in the atmosphere of a nightly news show, Franken and staff spent time in the offices of "Nightline."

"We wanted to be grounded in some reality, to do a workplace comedy where we understood what their actual work was. What we saw there was how exciting it is to get a show on every night," said Franken.

As with "Nightline," the sitcom's news staff scrambles to put together programs on issues or breaking stories. But don't look for highly topical references in "Lateline." The six episodes NBC has ordered were taped months ago.

> "My fondest moments of childhood were watching TV."
> Al Franken
> Actor

The sitcom makes lighthearted use of its serious guests. In one episode, Gephardt and former Labor Secretary Robert Reich are set to appear as part of a strike story but end up as Buddy Hackett pundits for a misguided profile of the comedian.

A Gephardt-Reich duet on "Shipoopi," Hackett's number from the 1962 movie "The Music Man," ensues.

"We want to show people being themselves and write things appropriate for them. Their politics don't come into play," Markus said.

The ultimate goal is to appeal both to viewers plugged into politics and those who couldn't pick Bill Clinton or Newt Gingrich out of a police line-up.

It's like his Limbaugh book, Franken says. "You really didn't have to know much about politics to read the book and enjoy it. But if you did, you enjoyed it maybe a little bit more."

"Lateline" is a change of pace for the nasal-voiced comedian with the puckish grin. He earned his own live-TV stripes as a longtime writer-player for "Saturday Night Live," and regularly dabbles in political satire, including election commentary for Comedy Central.

Franken spun his Stuart Smalley character, a self-affirmation activist, into a 1992 book ("I'm Good Enough, I'm Smart Enough and Doggone It, People Like Me") and a 1995 movie, then took on right-wing radio host Limbaugh in the 1996 best seller.

As much as Franken delights in advocacy comedy, he confesses he's a softie for the fluffier side of TV.

"My fondest moments of childhood were watching TV with my dad and seeing comics like Buddy Hackett make my dad laugh. And sitcoms, too, like 'The Dick Van Dyke Show' and 'Sgt. Bilko.'"

His "Lateline" already has gotten one important thumbs up: Franken screened it for first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton at the White House.

"She laughed a lot. She said she'd show it to the president," Franken said.

Could Clinton be a future guest? "It'd be a pretty big favor to ask," he said.

GALWAY

From page 28

"So we cracked up and then we kept on going," Ikeda chuckles. "It was a lot of fun."

Although playing the flute is his love and favorite hobby, Galway started out as a pianist.

"We had a piano in our house, which probably was the worst piano in the world, but we owned it," Galway says. "Then I took up the violin, but this violin had the greatest collection of home-grown Irish woodworms in the world. So I took up the flute because we had a really good flute at home."

Galway's other musical interests include playing the tin whistle and conducting. Galway, who has been appointed the Principal Guest Conductor of the London Mozart players for the 1999-2000 season, looks forward to the event with much excitement.

"I've wanted to conduct from a long time ago, but my management was not really backing me up in that direction," Galway says. "Now, I have a new management and they think that it is a good idea and that I should do this."

"What I like the best about conducting is studying the scores and learning the music," Galway continues. "It's a whole new experience for me. When you play the flute, you study the scores but this is different. You have to study every part and know everything."

But knowing everything does not mean just knowing the notes on the page. Music means breathing out and expressing everyday experiences. Although Galway tours around the world, he still manages to find time for his wife and friends.

"I am also the local babysitter for my friends who live in the neighborhood,"Galway says. "They are professional musicians and so sometimes, when they are at work, they send their little girl over. It's a riot, I have to tell you," Galway adds, laughing.

In finding time for everyday things, Galway continues to find insight into emotions and human nature that he shares through music. With this second voice, Galway communicates the beauty of life while entertaining.

"Music is my life. It's a gift I have from God," Galway says. "If anyone has a gift from God and they recognize it, they should be thankful for it and really practice it so that it becomes something special. So that's what I do every day. It's kind of like a prayer."

MUSIC: James Galway will perform at the Veterans Wadsworth Theater on March 28 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $45, $42 and $11 with UCLA ID. For more information call (310) 825-2101.

MAGIC

"All I know is it's Penn-and-Teller type stuff," Teller says. "It tends to be stuff that makes you laugh and the little hairs stand up on the back of your neck at the same time."

The duo is adamant, however, about the distinction between the performances they give and other magic shows.

"Whereas other magicians are still following this 'I'll be a greasy guy in a tux with a lot of birds torturing women in front of a mylar curtain while playing a bad rip-off of old McWhiteboy motown music,' which seems to be a valid art form for some, others like us have decided to actually look into the truth," Penn says.

tion of magicians as actors playing the part of a magician, Penn says that he and Teller prefer to be thought of as swindlers who play swindlers.

The duo admits that 75 to 80 percent of what the audience sees in their show is trickery. They are not out to determinedly conceal the secrets of their magical mysteries.

"The secrets of magic are not kept secret because of some cabal that we all belong to by sacrificing young babies and dancing around bonfires naked. Although we do both of those things, its not an important part of keeping the secret," Penn says. "The secret is kept the same reason the secret to how to grind your pistons in your Volvo is kept secret – you don't care! You want somebody else to do it, find some guy to do it, isn't there a guy who does this?"

Rather than creating elaborate illusions, Penn and Teller are more interested in separating the truth from the nonsense, and who better to address that issue artistically than people whose lives have been spent learning to do deception.

Take Mofo, the psychic gorilla, for example. No illusions here. Teller confesses, "It's probably the cheesiest carnie trick you'll ever see. That's Mofo, Mo-fo, cause you know that's ghetto slang for mother fucker."

Penn becomes the sole voice for the duo, lacing the show with his unique brand of insight and cynicism.

Apparently Mofo had an unfortunate accident in the wild 10 years ago and Harvard's medical team picked him up. They chopped off his head, preserved it, gave him the power of speech and now he reads minds for Penn and Teller. Or so the story goes.

In the wake of all these previous theatrical tricks, it only seems appropriate that Penn and Teller conclude their performance with something as flashy as The Bullet Catch, a trick that has claimed the lives of 12 magicians, shot dead on stage.

"We get two audience members up – and incidentally, we're not one of those high-budget shows that bring along their own audience members. We just grab people out of the audience, but we ask for anyone who's conversant with weapons, with specifically handguns," says Teller.

Those audience members are asked to choose a bullet each, mark them, then examine and load the .357 magnum guns. With the audience members safely back in the audience, Penn and Teller walk to opposite ends of the stage, like an old fashioned duel.

Aiming the guns at each other's faces through panes of glass, Penn and Teller shoot at each other through the glass and catch the marked bullets in their teeth.

"People get very nervous during that trick. My mother doesn't like that trick at all," Teller says. "It's kind of a magic trick, but it's also kind of a daredevil stunt and also, frankly, given the current public unease about handguns, it ends up being a very interesting political exploration too."

THEATER: Penn and Teller will perform at the Wilshire Theater, 8440 Wilshire Blvd in Beverly Hills from March 25-April 5. There will also be a preview performance on March 24. Tickets for the preview performance are available for $30 and $35. Tickets for the regular performances range from $32-$42. Call (213) 365-3500.

VANDERZANDEN

Actually, it is wire barbed with bunnies. It's up to you to wrap this around the chairs and tape the plastic bunnies that fall off to the table, you do understand. Don't even think of doing research yet. It's not yet time. You must decorate, or else the whole thing could fall apart. Everyone knows this.

And you must now, of course, to refuel, bake a batch of oatmeal cookies and eat half of the batter as well as half of the cookies as soon as they leave the oven. After taking a few to your neighbor, this will leave you with four. Eat one more. Good. Three is a good amount to have left over for tomorrow. You're doing well. The paper is bound to be great. This is exactly where it should be two days before it's due. Perfect.

But don't forget, you still have to clean your room. Yes, take all the underwear you dumped on the floor this morning in a mad rush to catch the bus for a job interview back in the drawer. No, put down that Hemingway biography. It's not time to open that yet. You still have to sort your socks and look through all of your CDs to find the ones you need to hear right now. It's very important.

Pop both Run On albums onto your five-changer CD player, along with both Home Alive poetry/rock compilation albums and Radiohead's "OK Computer." Good work. They will help you to rearrange your "box o' school supplies." That must be resorted tonight. There's just no two ways about it.

Don't even think of doing research yet ... You must decorate.

You're doing well, and though by now you've cleaned not only the kitchen, living room, breakfast nook, but your room as well, it still isn't time to open your books. No, no, no, you've forgotten the most instrumental part of the preparatory process. That's right: flexing your muscles in front of the mirror as you belt out the lyrics to your favorite song on that one album that you can't remember the name of. I know, I can't believe you almost skipped this step either. But, it's okay. I caught you. Everything's back on track, running smoothly, right on schedule. Phee-yew.

OK, now you're going to have to do your jump on the bed and bounce up and down as you act like you're in the coolest video on the face of the earth and you're the most rad rock star, shit-kicking anti-hero ever to explode on screen. Duh, who could begin a paper without this burst of mega-ego to pump yourself up?

All right, now some relaxing will be required. You've worn yourself out with all this work. Papers are exhausting. Sometimes professors just don't realize the strain they place on students. Geez.

You have to turn the volume up and lie back. Take a deep breath and focus on the words. What is a CeeBee GeeBee haircut, you wonder, and why would it be easier to drive down but harder to drive back on Christmas Day. It's just too confusing. This is hurting your brain. Oh, it's excruciating. You should really get some rest. In fact, just go to sleep. You've done enough work for one night. Tomorrow you can wake up bright and early and do some reading for your other classes. That will alleviate some stress and get you further ahead on your paper. It's already two in the morning. But good work, you've done great for one night. Fitzgerald would be proud.

VanderZanden is a third-year English student.

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make your ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

The ASUCLA Communications board fully supports the University of California's policy on nondiscrimination. No medium shall accept advertisements which present persons of any origin, race, sex, or sexual orientation in a demeaning way or imply that they are limited to positions, capabilities, roles, or status in society. Neither the Daily Bruin nor the ASUCLA Communications Board has investigated any of the services advertised or the advertisements represented in this issue. Any person believing that an advertisement in this issue violated the Board's policy on nondiscrimination stated herein should communicate complaints in writing to the Business Manager, Daily Bruin, 118 Kerckhoff Hall, 308 Westwood Plaza, Los Angeles, CA 90024. For assistance with housing discrimination problems, call the UCLA Housing Office at (310) 825-4271 or call the Westside Fair Housing Office at (310) 475-9671. Classified ads also appear on-line at http://www.dailybruin.ucla.edu. Placement on-line is offered as a complimentary service for customers and is not guaranteed. great effort. Considering the magnitude of the game, this was one of our best performances both offensively and defensively."

UCLA tied its season high by converting nine of 17 three-point attempts and made 55 percent of its field-goal attempts.

The entire Bruin lineup was hot – Johnson had a game-high 25 points while Bailey converted seven of his 11 field goal attempts (including 3 of 4) from the three-point stripe to propel him to a 19-point performance, while J.R. Henderson, Earl Watson and Travis Reed also scored in the double digits.

It was a good thing for the Bruins that their shots were falling, because they were absolutely dominated on the boards by the much taller Wolverines.

Led by 6-foot-8-inch Robert "Tractor" Traylor and 6-foot-9-inch Jerod Ward, the Wolverines out-rebounded UCLA 44-27.

"We lost to a team we should have beaten," Michigan head coach Brian Ellerbe said. "We had lots of opportunities; we just didn't take advantage of them."

But the Bruins took advantage of every opportunity they got, and as a result, they will be competing with Kentucky, Duke and Syracuse for the right to advance to the Final Four.

One uncertainty that remains is how healthy point guard Baron Davis will be. Davis came out of the game late in the first half after rolling his ankle and hearing a pop. He returned in the second half hobbling, picking up three quick fouls before leaving – having played only a total of 14 minutes.

"I'm not sure right now what the situation is," Davis said. "I'll have to wait for the MRI (on Monday)."

Regardless, the Bruins answered a question that's been on everybody's mind the entire season.

Yes, they really can play 40 minutes of good basketball.

And when they do, they are hard to beat.

Arizona rocked Bruin starting pitcher Chad Cislak on Saturday, scoring 13 runs (12 earned) off him in his homecoming appearance. The freshman Cislak (2-5), a Tucson native, did not have the kind of outing he wanted to have in front of his family and friends.

Cislak's nemesis in the game was Arizona's Jason Hendricks (4 for 5), who drove in a career-high eight runs. He hit a two-run single in the first, a three-run homer in the third and a three-run double in the fifth.

UCLA pitching did not do much better in Sunday's finale, but neither did the Arizona staff. The teams com-

And he didn't.

In the last 38 seconds, Johnson made eight trips to the charity stripe.

And all eight times, the senior connected. His free throws kept it a two-possession game, and soon time would run out for Michigan as UCLA held on for the upset, 85-82. The victory earned the Bruins a trip to St. Petersburg, Fla., to play No. 2-seed Kentucky in the Sweet Sixteen.

"I knew Kris, after getting into foul trouble in the last game (against Miami), was definitely going to come out and have a big game," Bailey said.

Johnson's game-high 25 points and 6-for-10 shooting was a sharp contrast to his Friday effort against Miami.

In the first-round matchup, Johnson, who averages 18.1 points, only had three points, making only one of six field-goal attempts and fouled out of the game with 2:35 left.

But aside from his 60 percent shooting clip, Johnson was also 11 of 13 from the free-throw line. On the year, the 6-foot-4-inch guard/forward is an 83.8 percent free-throw shooter.

If Johnson were to miss a free throw, it would have given Michigan a thread of hope. However, Johnson has been Mr. Clutch many times this year, hitting the three-pointer at the buzzer to win it against Washington State in Pullman and hitting another three in Seattle to give UCLA a one-point lead over Washington with 2.1 seconds left.

"Nerves? Maybe when I was a freshman, I would be nervous," Johnson said.

"But I've been in that situation many times in my career where I have to make free throws, and I've converted. It's a situation where I want to be there, I'm one of the three seniors on the team, and I think anyone of us would step up in that situation. That's what we want – the pressure, all the weight on our shoulders.

"When I went up to the line I was just concentrating on knocking them down like I always do, and that's what I did."

BASEBALL

bined for 22 runs in the game, moving the weekend's run total to 86 (54 for Arizona, 32 for UCLA).

The Wildcats took an early 6-0 lead off Bruin starter Jon Brandt, who was the closer in Friday's game. He left the game after 6 innings with a 10-6 deficit that was soon erased by right-fielder Eric Byrnes' second three-run homer of the game. Left fielder Brett Nista also hit two homers, but the efforts by the top two hitters in the Bruin lineup were not enough to pull out a victory.

Arizona's Jason Shroyer leadoff homer in the bottom of the eighth inning broke a 10-10 tie and propelled the Wildcats to the 12-10 win.

weekend."

The Richmond Spiders, reminiscent of 1989, knocked off South Carolina. Valparaiso won in what has been the most exciting finish through out the weekend. Syracuse staved off upset-minded Iona with a trey.

Hell, even UCLA almost got upset by some hungry Hurricanes, but with an out-of-control Toby Bailey pass and a soft shot by Henderson, the Bruins prevailed.

When Valparaiso's Bryce Drew took an ill-advised shot with 10 ticks left on the clock, I thought, "There goes the game." My heart sank, and I was ready to turn the channel, but something amazing happened. Ole Miss' star player shanked his two free throws and Valpo would pull off a major upset as Drew nailed a trey at the buzzer.

Amazing. Impossible. Basketball.

The first two rounds of the NCAA tournament should be national holidays. I want my spring break during the tournament. Who cares if you have to break up our quarter. No one really pays attention during class anyways.

Damn, let's have a class at UCLA all about the tournament. I can see a psychology class – Basketball 101: The Stupor Effect. Communication Studies 107: Social Relations During the Tourney.

It's all for basketball.

The first two rounds are what I watch the tourney for: the upsets, the tears, the dreams of hundreds of players being smashed or fulfilled through one shot.

Don't get me wrong. The rest of the tournament is special, but there are just not as many games to watch where the underdog can shine. Last year was special, with Arizona shocking the world. This year, who knows, maybe Michigan State or Rhode Island can shock the world.

No. 1-seeds lose their meanings as the tourney wears on. Just ask North Carolina, which had to go overtime against UNC Charlotte, or Duke, which almost lost to Oklahoma State.

I got a bad case of the basketball jones.

Ask my girlfriend.

"Ya wanna go out? Arkansas' playing ... Wait till after the games are done."

When the games are finally done for the night I need more basketball.

"We can't go now. Gotta watch the highlights on ESPN and FoxSports ... Wait till they are done."

By the time ESPN coverage is over, it's midnight.

"We can't catch a late-night show, honey ... Gotta get some sleep to catch the 9 a.m. game."

A friend of mine told me that he would rather go out with his woman then to watch the UCLA-Miami game. I laughed at him and asked, "But does your girl got game?"

There is another aspect of March

Attention: Students and Faculty in Humanities Courses!

Did you or one of your students write a terrific paper in a humanities course during spring or fall quarters of 1997 or this winter quarter? If so, please plan to submit the paper for

The Teague-Melville-Elliott and Peter Rotter Essay Prizes
recognizing superior achievement in undergraduate research scholarship in the Humanities.

Eligibility

The competition is open to ALL UCLA undergraduates who were/are enrolled in an undergraduate humanities course during either Spring Quarter 1997, Fall Quarter 1997, or Winter Quarter 1998. The submitted paper must have been written as a course assignment and must be nominated by the instructor of record, with a cover letter from the sponsoring professor highlighting the strengths of the paper. (No other application form is necessary.)

Awards

The Teague-Melville-Eliott Prize winner will receive $1065.
The Peter Rotter Essay Prize winners receive $1,000 and $500 each.

Deadline for submission of faculty nominations: Friday, March 20, 1998. But papers can be submitted at any time this quarter between now and then to 271 Kinsey Hall.

For more information, contact your departmental advisor, or you may direct questions to Dr. Janette Lewis, 825-6172 or lewis@humnet.ucla.edu.

and to determine if a fight occurred and those individuals who participated in a fight.

"Officials may not use replay equipment for judgement calls such as who fouled, basket interference or goaltending, release of the ball before the sounding of the horn, etc."

Sophomore Maylana Martin, who scored 11 of her 13 points in the second half, felt as though the decision was not a fair one.

"I know that we won," Martin said. "If we were at home, then things would have turned out differently."

From the start of the game, the Bruins had to face several obstacles. Playing in front of more than 3,000 Crimson Tide fans didn't help the situation. However, the Bruins displayed the tenacity and gut-wrenching team play that had brought them all the way from not having a preseason ranking to becoming the No.25-ranked team in the nation.

Junior Janae Hubbard led the Bruins with 19 points, shooting 8 of 12 from the field. In the first half, Hubbard dominated 6-foot-2-inch senior Tausha Mills. In what was supposed to be the battle of the "giant" centers, Hubbard out-rebounded and outscored Mills, who ended the game with 12 points.

The Bruins had a 41-28 lead going into halftime. The Crimson Tide came out of the locker room on fire, sparking a 9-0 run led by senior Dominique Canty, who finished with a game high of 28 points.

University of Alabama's head coach Rick Moody was indifferent about the decision and felt as though his team played exceptionally well.

"I thought our basketball team set the tempo early," Moody said. "We got going early with our defense. We were able to generate turnovers into points on the offensive end. Hopefully, we'll be ready to play Sunday night (against Notre Dame)."

Many fans expressed disbelief in the final decision. Ed Kelley, a resident of Meridian, Miss., who came to support the Crimson Tide, felt as though UCLA was cheated out of a victory.

"We do things a little bit different in the South," Kelley said. "I feel that the officials were wrong all night, and they are the ones to blame"

Frank Lassiter, sports director of WVUA Radio in Tuscaloosa, shared similar sentiments.

"It seems impossible with less than .8 of a second left, that one can throw the ball the length of the court, have it touch the hands of someone else, and end in the hands of another player who then turns around and makes another shot," Lassiter said.

The Bruins defeated the University of Michigan 65-58 in the first round Friday night. Martin led the team with 16 points, and sophomores Melanie Pearson and Jannae Hubbard scored 15 and 12 points, respectively.

Junior Maylana Martin was named a finalist for the Division I Kodak Women's All-America Basketball team.

start and didn't put up the numbers we're used to."

While Naeve was cold and hot, Stanford's Andy Witt brought enough heat to the floor to warm the entire gym. The sophomore outside hitter, who has had up and down performances this season, punished UCLA with 26 kills, two aces and 10 digs.

The Brtins rebounded on Saturday night to handily defeat the University of Pacific 15-12, 15-9, 15-7.

UCLA outhit Pacific .493 to .315. Middle blocker Danny Farmer led the Bruin attack with 20 kills in two games for a blistering .750 hitting percentage (20-2-24). Tom Stillwell added 19 kills and seven digs to help the Bruin effort. Despite being under the weather for most of the week and receiving clearance to play late Friday, the senior captain of the Bruin squad hit .692 for the night.

The Bruin bench contributed as well, with Matt Davis and Mark Williams both hitting over .500 with seven kills and eight kills, respectively.

UCLA will host Rutgers University on Tuesday night for a non-conference match. The Bruins hold a 4-0 series lead over the Scarlet Raiders.

finals.

Scott Slover could have possibly won the pole vault title but was disqualified for voulzing the bar at 18-2 1/2 feet. Voulzing is when a person uses his hands or arms to try to balance the bar.

He finished seventh at 17-10 1/2. Larsen felt the call was correct and was disappointed because Slover cleared 18-2 1/2, a mark that would've placed him at least fourth. He nonetheless garnered All-American honors.

Allen is another Bruin who claimed All-American honors. Allen, at his first indoor championships, finished seventh in the 200 meters in a personal record time of 21.06 seconds.

Mark Hauser finished 14th in an extremely fast 3,000 meter race in 8:10.19. The winner, Adam Goucher of Colorado won in 7:46.03 seconds and Washington State's Bernard Lagat finished second in 7:46.45.

Travis Haynes and Wade Tift both received All-American honors in the shot put. Haynes finished eighth with a mark of 60-6 1/2, and Tift was right behind him in ninth place at 60-5 3/4.

Luke Sullivan, also at his first indoor championship, earned an All-American spot in the 35-pound weight throw. Sullivan's throw of 65-7 3/4 placed him fifth.

Jim McElroy had a good start in his preliminary race but stumbled three-quarters of the way through and missed the finals by two-hundredths of a second.

"It was a good meet," Larsen said. "Generally, we don't do much indoors but I think this meet is a good introduction to the outdoor season."

game in 12 outings and 18th in their last 20, unraveled after staying even with the Lakers through three quarters.

Vancouver managed only five field-goal attempts in the first six minutes of play in the fourth period and were limited to nine points over that span.

> The Lakers took control ... from the start of the fourth period.

"We gave them too many easy baskets (in the fourth quarter)," said coach Brian Hill, whose Grizzlies committed five of their 14 turnovers in the final period. "Every time it was a turnover or a missed shot, it was a 3-on-1 or a 3-on-2 going to the other end.

"That is our fault."

Center Bryant Reeves led the Grizzlies for the third time in four games with 24 points, while Shareef Abdur-Rahim added 23.

Despite shooting 67.6 percent from the field in the first half, the Lakers failed to take control. The Grizzlies shot 61 percent. The first half finished tied 63-63 when Vancouver's Lee Mayberry hit a three-pointer with two seconds left.

The Grizzlies set a franchise record for most points in a quarter, scoring 39 points in the second, and the two teams combined to hit 64 percent of their field goals, the most ever for one half in a Grizzlies' game.

knew we had to turn on today in order to win," Gall said. "We came into the game expecting them to come on strong so we came out strong right from the first quarter. We all felt good going into the game."

This game was especially important for the Bruins because they have not played the Cardinal since the beginning of last season. With the unexpected upset over formerly No. 2 Cal last week, Saturday's match was not taken lightly.

"We try to play every game with the same importance, but this was a conference game and they beat Cal the weekend before," Baker said. "So it was pretty important because we wanted to know where we stood in the whole thing."

Now they know. Now everyone knows. The Bruins are still No. 1.

After Saturday's confidence booster, UCLA welcomed San Jose State on Sunday with a more relaxed but equally effective attitude.

Even with the absence of top player Coralie Simmons, the Bruins had no trouble sweeping the game with the score of 18-0.

The San Jose State Spartans didn't have a chance.

Five impressive goals by Catherine von Schwarz and four by freshman Beauregard only tell half the story. The Bruins had so much room to spare against the No. 14 Spartans that every team member got a piece of the action.

"I was happy with the way players who usually don't get much time played," Baker said. "They usually don't get a lot of minutes but they played well. And Catherine's getting back into it. She's starting to look good."

After a successful weekend, the Bruins look forward to another turn at hosting when they welcome the University of Massachusetts at 3 p.m., Tuesday at the Men's Gym pool.

Very likely, the guest will once again leave with a dissatisfied frown.

Madness that is always overlooked: the women's tourney.

Hell yeah, I watch the women's games on ESPN2. It's basketball. Once you get that fever you need more games to keep you running, and the women's tourney is the same as the men's, minus the dunks.

UC Santa Barbara stunned Vanderbilt. Great game. Stunning outcome. In the lulls where there are no men's games, I immediately find a women's game and it soothes my fever like chicken noodle soup.

I have a suggestion for a TV mogul: one, big-ass NCAA tournament station. Just play tournament games, men's and women's. I would sit in a stupor all day long watching that channel. It would show upsets, blowouts, focus on certain conferences in the tournament.

Forget NBC's "Must See TV." How about "Must SEC TV." They would show Kentucky, Arkansas and the rest of the SEC in the tourney. Instead of ActionPack on Channel 5, how about ActionPac-10. UCLA, Stanford, Arizona, men and women playing hoops.

I can see the Neilson ratings going up now.

Let's face the honest truth: Everybody loves basketball.

Calcavecchia defeats Singh in Honda Classic

PGA: Montgomerie still without win after finishing in third place

By Doug Ferguson
The Associated Press

CORAL SPRINGS, Fla. – Mark Calcavecchia made five birdies on the final seven holes to run away from Vijay Singh and the rest of the field at the Honda Classic, closing with a 65 for a three-stroke victory.

Calcavecchia, who had promised to go at every pin, didn't have a choice on a calm, soft day ripe for low scores. He kept his pledge to the end, firing at the flag on the 18th for a birdie that gave him an 18-under 271.

His ninth PGA Tour victory was worth $324,000 and made him only the 11th player to surpass $8 million in career earnings.

"Chasing a leader who doesn't make any mistakes makes a difference," said Singh, who closed with a 67. "I was just trying to keep up with him."

Colin Montgomerie finished with a 66. He was alone in third at 275 but still 0-for-46 on the PGA Tour.

"It's encouraging," he said. "I'm looking forward especially now to The Players Championship and the Masters."

John Daly rebounded from a 76 in the second round with great play on the weekend. He tied the course record of 8-under 64 and wound up tied for fourth with Jeff Maggert and defending champion Stuart Appleby. Maggert, whose 41 on the back nine Saturday afternoon knocked him six strokes off the lead, tied a tournament record with a 7-under 29 on the front to briefly take the lead. But he played the back even par for a 65.

Calcavecchia didn't have to look at the lifeless trees or feel the heavy, muggy air to realize what it would take to win. Not long after his drive landed softly in the first fairway, he no longer had the lead.

That belonged to Maggert, who stormed back from a third-round 76 to birdie six of the first seven holes.

One group ahead, Daly thrilled a large following with a 2-iron from 252 yards that settled 15 feet away, on the fringe on the par-5 14th. He holed it for eagle, putting him within two strokes of the lead.

But Daly's approach on the par-5 16th veered left into a bunker and he failed to get up and down for birdie.

Calcavecchia's steady playing paid off as he became the third two-time winner of the Honda Classic. Calcavecchia, who admits to being superstitious, changed coins in his pocket to mark his ball after the 11th hole and birdied the next three. He also used the same ball over the final seven holes. "It was kind of beat up, but I was on a roll," he said.

Murdoch's moves rehash history

MLB: New owner sits in shadow of O'Malley's success with Dodgers

By Matt McHale
Los Angeles Daily News

He was a baseball bully whose radical ideas scared owners into thinking he would turn the sport on its ear.

His backroom dealing was legendary, his bigger-than-life persona forever a hot topic on both coasts. Many called him the de facto commissioner of baseball. Others called him things less flattering.

Rupert Murdoch? Not yet.

The original was Walter O'Malley, and in a week his son sells the Dodgers to Murdoch. Perhaps there are lessons to learn on how the new ownership will play out. If O'Malley's legacy tells us anything, it is that change is good, even if it seems uncomfortable at the time.

There will be many who cringe at all the new advertising at Dodger Stadium this year. For more than 30 years, Union Oil, which funded the construction, was the only ad. The luxury boxes along the club level will look strange. The international makeup of the team will only grow stronger with Murdoch's global television reach. Even if it hurts clubhouse chemistry.

But you've been through this all before.

There remain angry Angelenos over the sweetheart deal O'Malley received to put the Dodgers in Chavez Ravine. The plan for funding a major-league team in Los Angeles passed by fewer than 25,000 votes. But when you are sitting in your seats on a balmy August night with the Dodgers deep into a pennant race, remember that this didn't happen by accident.

Forty years ago this season, the Dodgers played their first game in Los Angeles, drawing more than 93,000 fans in the Coliseum. O'Malley was viewed as a visionary, a Bronx lawyer who became the Lewis and Clark of baseball. His teams would go on to untold success in the National League and at the box office. But he broke a lot of hearts along the way.

The borough of Brooklyn has never recovered. Nobody minded much when O'Malley convinced Horace Stoneham's New York Giants to leave the Polo Grounds for San Francisco. The Dodgers, on the other hand, were Brooklyn. Gil Hodges lived up the street. Roy Campanella owned a neighborhood liquor store.

O'Malley already had a sinister image for wresting control of the team from baseball immortal Branch Rickey in 1950. But even with the takeover, O'Malley was losing his shirt in Brooklyn. Unlike Murdoch, whose companies grossed $11 billion last year, O'Malley had trouble giving raises to future Hall of Famers Duke Snider and Jackie Robinson.

Maybe the distance between players and fans today dilutes the memory. But O'Malley's move to Los Angeles remains the single greatest business decision in sports history.

City fathers in Brooklyn laughed at his plans to construct a Plexiglas-domed stadium. They were convinced his 32,000-seat Ebbets Field, which had just 700 parking spaces, was fine. But to O'Malley, an average attendance of 15,761 in 1956 when they won their last Brooklyn pennant demanded a new direction.

It might be more accurate to blame the city of New York for ignoring the needs of one of its greatest resources. In order to be competitive in a business a fraction of today's size, the Dodgers had to think big. But it was O'Malley who took the Eiffel Tower out of Paris.

Moving to Los Angeles was just as sticky. There was a Mexican-American community in Chavez Ravine. The city moved the residents. Murdoch faces similar problems with the neighborhood if there is stadium expansion and maybe the arrival of an NFL team.

After moving into Dodger Stadium in 1962, the Dodgers quickly became the best draw in baseball. Moving here tripled the landscape. Teams were living with attendance around one million. The Dodgers were drawing 3 million regularly before O'Malley died in 1981.

O'Malley's success placed him at the top of baseball's hierarchy. He kept the fan in mind and the team in first place. World Series titles in 1963 and '65 looked great. But in the end, the guys with big ideas see big results. The Dodgers of today might win this year, but without Murdoch's energy and resources, they aren't going to keep up.

Lakers submerge Grizzlies with Nick Van Exel's return

NBA: Vancouver holds own with good shooting until fourth quarter

The Associated Press

VANCOUVER, British Columbia – The knee's fine, the back's a little sore, but most importantly, the touch was still there as Nick Van Exel's 18 minutes of play were most welcome in his first game in a month.

"Nick did far better than anybody could have hoped for," coach Del Harris said after his Los Angeles Lakers won their sixth straight, beating the Vancouver Grizzlies 119-110 Sunday afternoon. "I was just hoping that he could get out and get a little feel. I really didn't expect him to make a big contribution.

"Instead, he made a very large contribution."

Activated from the injured list prior to the game, Van Exel's status was still in question after he developed back spasms.

"I really couldn't tell you (what to expect), but it was fun just being back out there," said Van Exel, who missed 13 games after undergoing arthroscopic surgery to the right knee he injured on Feb. 15 against Houston.

"I just wanted to go out there and be patient and let my game come to me."

Clinging to a 90-88 lead through three quarters against the feisty Grizzlies, the Lakers took control by going on a 15-4 run from the start of the fourth period.

Van Exel sparked the run, setting up Robert Horry's dunk to open the quarter, then hitting a three-point shot. He eventually finished with eight points and six assists.

Horry scored 13 of his season-high 23 points in the second half, while Shaquille O'Neal led the way with 24 points as the Lakers moved within three games of the idle first-place Seattle SuperSonics in the Pacific Division standings. Horry, coming off a season-high 14 rebounds in Thursday's win over the Los Angeles Clippers, also pulled down a team-high 13 against Vancouver.

> "We gave them too many easy baskets (in the fourth quarter)."
> Brian Hill
> Grizzlies head coach

"It's all garbage stuff. I just happened to be in the right place at the right time," said Horry. "Right now it's time for everyone to contribute, no matter who it is."

As for Van Exel's return, Horry added, "For a guy who hadn't played, I thought he would be a little bit more rusty. He looked good out there."

Track championships finish with big wins, small losses

NCAA: UMass shot-putter makes emotional victory, as Wheaton takes second

By Marvin Pave
The Boston Globe

WALTHAM, Mass. – It was a bittersweet birthday for UMass-Boston shot-putter Robert Grieco and a near-miss but an impressive second-place finish for the Wheaton women Saturday at the NCAA Division 3 indoor track and field championships.

Brandeis University rolled out the red carpet at its Gosman Sports and Convocation Center, on the school's 50th anniversary, but a pair of Judges runners – defending indoor 800-meter champs Victoria Petrillo and Geoff Getz – had the rug pulled out from under them, finishing second, respectively, to Erin Hipp of Ohio Northern and Amherst's Robert Mitchell.

Lincoln (Pa.) University recaptured the men's team title, winning for the third time in four years, and Christopher Newport University of Newport News, Va., withstood Wheaton's challenge, edging the Norton school by three points to defend its women's title.

Grieco, with his mother, Alida, and sister, Josie, among the crowd that packed the field house, won the men's shot put with a personal-best toss of 58 feet 5 1/4 inches on his 23rd birthday, just one month after his father, Antonio, died while vacationing in Italy.

"I couldn't sleep all day yesterday," said Grieco, who played football and was on the track team at Medford High and was named to the ECAC All-Star team last fall as a linebacker for the Beacons. "I woke up about 4:30 in the morning, and that was it. I dedicated this day to my father, and because I missed qualifying for this meet a year ago by a quarter of a inch, it made me work all that much harder to do well today."

UMass coach Rich Hart said Grieco took a week and a half off from training and meets after his father's death but regained his competitive focus. "He's a real student of the game, and he's been improving steadily since January," said Hart.

Just about the entire Wheaton administrative hierarchy was in the stands to cheer on coach Paul Souza's women's team, which, in just its fourth season of varsity track, had never won a point in the indoor nationals. Sophomore Deshawnda Williams won the 400-meter dash, and freshman Colleen Myrie was second to defending champ Meshailay Robinson of Christopher Newport in the 55-meter dash.

Wheaton then won the day's final event, the 4x400-meter relay, with Myrie running the third leg and Williams closing strong at anchor. But Christopher Newport, which needed to place fourth to win the team title, was runner-up.

Petrillo, the two-time defending indoor 800 champ, was hampered by a sprained ankle but held the lead through most of her final lap until Hipp's lunge at the wire. Getz actually bettered his indoor winning time of a year ago, posting a 1:51.62, but Mitchell, who fell in the 1,500 meters and wanted to make up for it, came back to overtake Getz at the final turn and won going away in 1:50.85.

"Geoff's a great runner, but I felt if I beat him to the final turn I could maintain my lead," said Mitchell, a native of Worcester, Vt., who was recently named the National Indoor Athlete of the Year by the U.S. Track Coaches Association. He came into the meet with a national best 1:50.19 and lived up to his advance billing.

Brandeis coach Bruce Bickford was philosophical about the performances of Petrillo and Getz. "Victoria and Geoff ran well," he said. "They made their moves at the right time. They were just beaten down the stretch by better runners on this day."

Tomba slides into gilded victory with World Cup slalom title

SKIING: Italian weeps for joy in priceless moment, as he nears retirement

By Vania Grandi
The Associated Press

CRANS MONTANA, Switzerland – Alberto Tomba threw himself to the ground at the finish line, rolled on his back and burst into tears. Then he stripped to his undershirt and hugged his sister.

"It is really great, unbelievable," he said, wiping the tears with snow. "I am so emotional."

In a startling reversal of his poor showing at the Olympics, Tomba won the last World Cup slalom of the season on Sunday.

His 50th career victory came as many were anticipating his retirement announcement after nearly two years of mediocre performances.

"This was a very important win for me, especially after ... Nagano," said Tomba, who failed in Japan to add to his collection of five Olympic medals. "For me, today's victory is more than a gold medal. It is a platinum one."

He was timed in one minute, 42.84 seconds. Olympic slalom champion, Hans-Petter Buraas of Norway, was second, 14-hundredths of a second behind. Norway's Finn Christian Jagge was third.

The 31-year-old Italian reenacted a scene from his heyday. Pumped by the cheers of 11,000 fans, Tomba took off his skis and hurled them into the crowd. Then he tossed his poles, gloves, hat and goggles.

He proceeded to tear off his clothing, layer by layer, to end up with just a sleeveless blue undershirt and the bottom half of his racing suit.

At last month's Olympic giant slalom – an event he won twice at previous Winter Games – he fell after only a few turns. In the slalom, he finished 17th in the first run, then pulled out of the second leg.

His only other World Cup victory this season was in a night slalom in Schladming, Austria, at the beginning of January.

Tomba burst onto the scene in Crans Montana 11 years ago, winning the bronze medal at the 1987 world championships. He went on to win the slalom and giant slalom at the 1988 Calgary Olympics, a gold and silver at the 1994 Albertville Games and another silver in Lillehammer in 1994.

At the 1996 world championships, he captured the giant slalom and slalom titles. But he hadn't done much since.

Now, with this grand finale to his season, Tomba may decide to act on his hints to call it quits.

"Some people say it is better to quit as a winner," he said. "I must wait and decide at home."

Sunday's victory was Tomba's 35th World Cup slalom win. Only Ingemar Stenmark of Sweden, who retired a decade ago, has won more with 40.

Tomba upstaged Austria's Thomas Sykora, who retained his World Cup slalom title, finishing just four points ahead of teammate Thomas Stangassinger.

Stangassinger led the standings by 12 points over Sykora going into the race, but finished too far behind Sykora to keep his advantage.

Terrapins to hunt down Wildcats in Sweet 16

TOURNAMENT: Maryland on way to Arizona game after making free throws, evading turnovers to Illinois

The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO — For the first time since Joe Smith took his game to the NBA, Maryland is back in the Sweet 16 of the NCAA tournament.

The current group of Terrapins now have a chance to do something that Smith never did – win a regional semifinal game.

Maryland returned to the round of 16 for the third time in five years by beating Illinois 67-61 Saturday. The Terrapins led by 13 in the first half, trailed by three with seven minutes left and won the game at the free-throw line after going the final 3:54 without a basket.

"We're still playing, and everyone is contributing," Maryland forward Rodney Elliott said. "I always had confidence we could do this."

Next up is top-seeded Arizona, the defending national champions, in the West Regional semifinals Thursday night in Anaheim.

The Wildcats (29-4) figure to be quite a bit more competitive than Utah State and Illinois, Maryland's two tournament victims thus far.

Arizona outscored its first two opponents 181-109, including an 82-49 rout of Illinois State on Saturday.

"It's hard for any team to stay with us if we come out with a lot of intensity," Arizona guard Mike Bibby said.

Intensity might not be as much a factor as sheer talent, and the Wildcats are stocked, particularly in the backcourt.

Miles Simon had 19 points and six assists against Illinois State, which hung with the Wildcats for a half before wilting.

Maryland, conversely, held on after a strong first half. The Terrapins committed a season-low four turnovers and were 11-for-13 at the line.

"We're having fun," guard Terrell Stokes said. "We're enjoying this. You don't get too many shots in the NCAA tournament."

Actually, fourth-seeded Maryland (21-10) is in the midst of its fifth-straight trip to the NCAA tournament.

Led by Smith, the Terrapins reached the final 16 in 1994 and 1995.

But after the talented 6-foot-10-inch center departed following his sophomore season, Maryland lost in the first round in 1996 and 1997.

Obinna Ekezie is not to be confused with Smith, but the junior center had two excellent games in Sacramento.

Together with forwards Rodney Elliot and Laron Profit, the trio hopes to give Arizona all sorts of problems near the basket.

"Maryland is going to be big inside," Simon said. "That's going to be a battle from the start. We have to be ready to play."

U.S. team kicks aside losing streak

SOCCER: Americans show off for World Cup spots in Paraguay game

By Patrick Hipes
Los Angeles Daily News

SAN DIEGO — An air of confidence accompanied the U.S. national team off the soccer field Saturday, the result of an entertaining, 2-2 tie with World Cup-bound Paraguay in front of 15,253 spectators at Qualcomm Stadium. Using an experimental lineup designed to audition players for precious roster spots in France, the United States played with more energy than at any time during the three-game losing streak it endured since beating Brazil in the CONCACAF Gold Cup semifinals in early February.

"I thought we played a very attractive brand of soccer today," coach Steve Sampson said. "Even though we had a different lineup, we still played this game to win it."

In losses to Mexico, Holland and Belgium over an 11-day span last month, the tired Americans looked ineffective. Against Paraguay, however, the United States created numerous chances behind a new look midfield of Chad Deering and Mike Sorber, outshooting the opponent 17-8.

If not for Paraguay tying the match on a penalty kick in the 75th minute, it would have been even better.

"There's always room for improvement," midfielder Joe-Max Moore said. "At times we held the ball pretty well, but we could've done better. Paraguay is a good team."

The United States had taken a 2-1 lead five minutes into the second half, after defender Marcelo Balboa headed home an improbable shot off an Alexi Lalas cross.

Balboa, playing in his 126th game for the national team – making him third in the world all-time in international appearances – dove toward the ground to head the ball, which floated above goalkeeper Ruben Ruiz Diaz into the upper left corner from 8 yards.

> "(The game is) a chance for me to maybe show what I can do."
> Chad Deering
> Midfielder

"I was just trying to put it on net," said Balboa, who attended nearby San Diego State. "I didn't see it until after I hit the ground and turned around. It must have been going slow."

Paraguay had taken a 1-0 lead in the 15th minute when Denis Canzia beat U.S. goalkeeper Juergen Sommer to the left post.

The United States, however, tied the game six minutes later when Deering, playing his first national team match in nearly a year, headed in an Eric Wynalda corner kick.

It was the first goal for the United States since the Brazil victory, in a span of 315 minutes.

The 27-year-old Texan, in and out of the U.S. pool over the years, played solidly in offensive and defensive midfield roles Saturday and secured a place for the Americans' match against Austria on April 22 in Vienna.

After that, the United States will have three matches before opening World Cup pool play against Germany on June 15 in Paris. It leaves players like Deering little time to prove their worth.

"It's a chance for me to maybe show what I can do," said Deering, who played in Claudio Reyna's normal spot in the middle. "It's good for me to get an opportunity."

With overseas players like Ernie Stewart, Kasey Keller, Brad Freidel and Reyna not making the trip over and John Harkes, Jeff Agoos, Thomas Dooley and Eddie Pope with MLS clubs, it was a chance for Sampson to see what he might choose from for the 22-man World Cup roster.

"A lot of it is just about experience," said Galaxy defender Greg Vanney, who played 90 minutes on the left side of the defense, his first appearance with the U.S. side since last August. "In the end, you have to just play."

UCLA swept away by Stanford, but beats Scarlet Raiders

VOLLEYBALL: Bruin team sobered by loss, saves face with comeback win

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

Maybe the UCLA men's volleyball team isn't invincible after all.

After dropping a match to BYU last Friday, the top-ranked Bruins have suffered another conference loss – this time to defending national champion Stanford (12-4, 11-3 MPSF).

Before a crowd of 1,005 at Burnham Pavilion, the Cardinal swept UCLA 15-11, 15-12, 15-9. Friday the 13th proved to be unlucky for UCLA, which has lost more matches in one week than it has in two months of play.

"We just didn't play very well," UCLA head coach Al Scates said. "We played about the way we did against BYU the first night. We had a lot of trouble scoring, and one of the reasons was that we made a lot of service errors in the first game."

The Bruins (18-2, 11-2) posted 26 serving errors for the night, half of which came in the first game. UCLA did serve seven aces, though.

Setter Brandon Taliaferro and opposite Ben Moselle each led the team with two aces apiece, but they also recorded the most errors with six and seven missed serves respectively. Moselle also led the team in hitting with 20 kills in 29 attempts for a .483 clip.

Although UCLA's inability to serve effectively was part of the reason why the Bruins lost, an uncharacteristic performance from middle blocker Adam Naeve also affected UCLA.

The sophomore, who had been UCLA's most consistent performer, struggled on Friday night, notching only 17 kills in 43 attempts with 10 hitting errors for a .163 attack percentage.

"Adam Naeve and Brandon weren't connecting well," Scates said. "We went to Adam too much that night because he had been carrying us for so long. We were just hoping that he would start producing. Although he got better later in the evening, he got off to a very slow

Bruins pull out all the stops at NCAA Indoor Championships

M. TRACK: Team adorns itself in excitment of game, although no one brings home national championship

By Donald Morrison
Daily Bruin Contributor

While no one claimed a national championship at the NCAA Indoor Championships, members of the UCLA men's track and field team still entertained the crowd Friday and Saturday in Indianapolis, Ind.

Mebrahtom Keflezighi, running the 5,000 meters, nearly won his fifth NCAA championship. Keflezighi, who had to cut back on training the past two weeks due to soreness in his lower left leg, finished third in a tactical race in 14 minutes flat.

Keflezighi stayed in the front pack for most of the race before taking the lead with three laps to go on the 200-meter track.

With close to 150 meters remaining in the race, Brad Hauser from Stanford came up on Keflezighi and bumped him, causing Keflezighi to stumble a bit.

That stumble was all Hauser needed to win the race and for Keflezighi to fall to third. UCLA head coach Bob Larsen felt the contact was unintentional.

"It wasn't a particularly fast race," UCLA head coach Bob Larsen said.

"(Keflezighi) caught a good elbow and couldn't rally. He felt he could still win, but he was jostled."

The 5,000-meter race wasn't the only excitement Keflezighi created in one day. He also ran the 1,600-meter leg in the Distance Medly Relay less than a half hour after the 5,000 meters.

Washington State set a World's Best time of 9:29.54 in the highly competitive race, and Arkansas finished second in 9:30.45. UCLA placed seventh in 9:42.23, but it was Keflezighi who made the crowd roar.

Taking the baton from Jess Strutzel, who completed 800 meters, Keflezighi moved all the way up to third place at one point before falling to seventh. Keflezighi's split time for the 1,600 meters, about one mile, was 4:04.

"(Keflezghi) is very competitive," Larsen says. "The crowd got into it when they saw him move to third. We had a good time for a makeshift relay."

The original relay was supposed to consist of Damian Allen and Michael Granville, but Granville sat out because of a sore hamstring, and Larsen rested Allen for the 200-meter

CALIFORNIA SPORTS

Lakers 119, Grizzlies 110

The knee's fine, the back's a little sore, but most importantly the touch is still there as Nick Van Exel's contributions over 18 minutes were most welcome in his first game in a month.

"Nick did far better than anybody could have hoped for," coach Del Harris said after his Los Angeles Lakers won their sixth straight, beating the Vancouver Grizzlies 119-110 Sunday afternoon. "I was just hoping that he could get out and get a little feel. I really didn't expect him to make a big contribution.

"Instead, he made a very large contribution."

Activated off the injured list prior to the game, Van Exel's status was still in question after he developed back spasms.

"I really couldn't tell you (what to expect), but it was fun just being back out there," said Van Exel, who missed 13 games after undergoing arthroscopic surgery to the right knee he injured Feb. 15 against Houston.

Blazers 108, Clippers 92

Arvydas Sabonis had 28 points and 15 rebounds to rally the Portland Trail Blazers to a 103-92 victory over the Los Angeles Clippers Sunday night.

Sabonis made two straight baskets to give the Blazers a 94-89 lead with 2:25 remaining and the Clippers never got closer than four points the rest of the game. Sabonis, who made 11 of 17 field goal attempts, has 31 double-doubles this season.

After the Clippers' Rodney Rogers hit a 3-point basket, the Blazers scored the last seven points of the game. Neither team had led by more than seven points during the first 47 minutes of the game.

Raptors 100, Warriors 98

Doug Christie scored 24 points, including two free throws with 19.3 seconds left in overtime, as Toronto rallied to beat Golden State 100-98 Sunday night.

The Raptors overcame an 11-point deficit in the final 3:42 of regulation.

Todd Fuller's free throw with 2:18 left in OT put the Warriors up 96-94, but the Raptors scored the next six points.

Ben Wallace's two free throws with 1:13 left gave Toronto a 98-96 lead, and Christie's free throws gave the Raptors their first four-point lead of the game.

Golden State scored 59 points in the first half, but got only 39 over the next two quarters and overtime. The Warriors missed 11 of 13 shots in the extra period.

Mighty Ducks 5, Avalanche 3

The Anaheim Mighty Ducks got all of their goals on Sunday from players who haven't scored much this season -- which could mean anyone on the team except Teemu Selanne, Steve Rucchin and the injured Paul Kariya.

The Ducks snapped a seven-game losing streak Sunday with a 5-3 victory over the Colorado Avalanche as rookies Frank Banham and Matt Cullen scored power-play goals and Tomas Sandstrom ended a 34-game scoring drought with his seventh of the season.

"That's been happening the last few games now, and it's nice," said Rucchin, who has combined with Selanne and Kariya for 72 of Anaheim's 157 goals. "That's what we need. Guys are chipping in and they're working hard. I hope this is a sign of good things, and that other guys are going to start contributing."

Bruins run, jump, throw their way to respectable NCAA finish

W. TRACK: UCLA hangs on for 19th place as Texas rounds up national powers for victory

By Alvin Cadman
Daily Bruin Contributor

The day after the UCLA women's basketball team defeated Michigan in the 1998 NCAA Tournament and on the eve before the men would do the same, the UCLA women's track and field team had six of its finest competing at the 1998 NCAA Indoor Championships.

In Indianapolis, Ind., the Bruin women were challenged and fared well against the best in the nation from top track programs including Louisiana State University, which had won the last five track championships – until Saturday.

Texas won its fourth women's crown since 1986, stopping LSU's run of five in a row. Texas' blazing sprinting corps, led by Suziann Reid, carried the Longhorns to victory with 60 points.

Reid, the top women's 400 runner in the country entering the meet, didn't disappoint, winning in 52.57 seconds, the fastest time this season in the event. This all but ended LSU's hopes for a sixth consecutive title and ninth in 12 years.

LSU finished second in the team standings with 30 points, and Pittsburgh and Stanford tied for third with 26 each.

UCLA finished tied for 19th along with the Lady Tar Heels from North Carolina, each earning 11 points.

In the women's 200 meters, UCLA's Shakedia Jones placed eighth with a time of 23.78 seconds, 16 hundredths of a second off her personal best and one-hundredth of a second off her qualifying time for the NCAA Indoors. Lakeisha Backus of Texas won the race with a time of 23.18 seconds.

In the women's pole vault, Melissa Price of Fresno State broke her college record in the pole vault by three-quarters of an inch, soaring 13-10.

Redshirt freshman Erica Hoernig of UCLA took sixth with a vault of 12-1. This is a personal best for Hoernig and shatters her provisional indoor qualifying mark by over 3 inches.

In the women's triple jump, UCLA's Deana Simmons took sixth place with a jump of 43-7, almost 3 inches more than her indoor qualifying mark. This leap is also 3 inches longer than her personal best at the Pan-American Junior Games in Havana, Cuba, last year.

Pittsburgh's Trecia Smith completed a double in the women's horizontal jumps. She adds this triple jump title to the long jump championship she won Friday night with a leap of 46-1.

Her top jump is the best by a collegian this year.

Coming from the women's throwing events, Rachelle Noble took seventh in the women's 20-pound weight throw with a mark of 64-1, over 2 inches farther than her indoor qualifying throw.

In the shot put, UCLA sophomore Seilala Sua earned seventh place with a throw of 54-5. Following behind Sua was senior Nada Kawar, whose top throw of the afternoon was 51-9.

The Bruin women will now gear up for a dual meet next weekend at Drake Stadium against California, Air Force and UC Irvine.

The following weekend, the UCLA women's track and field team will travel to Northern California and compete in the prestigious Stanford Invitational.

Potent offenses go wild, Cats still manage win vs. struggling UCLA

BASEBALL: High-scoring series reminiscent of last year's stellar Bruin squad

By Kristina Wilcox
Daily Bruin Staff

The Six-Pac baseball series between UCLA and No. 5 Arizona this weekend in Tucson featured slugfests that were typical of UCLA baseball last season, but were not regular features of their games in 1998.

The Bruins (10-16, 5-9 in Six-Pac) won the first battle, 16-4, but lost the final two to the Wildcats (25-5, 7-5).

UCLA vs. Arizona
16-4, 7-18, 10-12

Bruin centerfielder Eric Valent swung a mighty bat in UCLA's lone victory. Valent (3 for 6) drove in a career-high six runs as the squad ended the Wildcats' 22-game, home winning-streak.

UCLA reliever Bobby Roe (3-1) benefited from the offensive outburst. Although he did not put forth an exemplary performance (1 2/3 innings, five runs), he was on the mound when it mattered.

Resounding wins secure Bruins as No. 1

W. POLO: Despite win against No. 2 Cal, Stanford proves to be no match for UCLA's superior play

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Staff

Saturday's convincing win against No. 2 Stanford (11-3) and Sunday's crushing sweep against San Jose State (18-0) confirmed that the UCLA women's water polo team is still No. 1.

Coming into the UCLA-Stanford game, the Bruins expected a strong contender. Stanford had beaten UCLA's biggest rival, Cal, just a week ago. Although the Bruins were comfortably ranked No. 1, they had yet to play the Cardinal.

Thus, at home, the Bruins came out strong from the beginning and left no breathing room for Stanford.

By the end of the first quarter, the Bruins had opened a quick 3-1 lead. Stanford made repeated attempts to counteract the Bruin storm, but UCLA's defense left the Cardinal denied. Stanford crumbled under pressure and eventually gave way to an eight-point deficit.

"Sometimes we come out a little tentative," said UCLA head coach Guy Baker, "so I was happy with the way we came out to shoot the ball from the outside early in the game. That set the tone for the rest of the game."

The Cardinal rallied to get back in the game, but the iron gates, held shut by the Bruin defense, were nearly impenetrable. In the first quarter alone, goalie and team captain Nicolle Payne made four out of five attempted saves.

"Everyone was hustling the whole game," Payne said. "We played defense well enough so that I could determine where the shots were coming from. Overall, it was great team defense."

> Even with the absence of top player Coralie Simmons, the Bruins had no trouble sweeping the game.

And the scores show that the Bruin offense wasn't too shabby either.

With such a deep, talented squad, any one of the starters could've walked away with the spotlight. However, teamwork was emphasized and every player chipped in an almost equal share of contributions.

Amanda Gall, Serela Mansur, Robin Beauregard and Kristin Guerin each contributed two points. Gall, who also made three turnovers, knew she and her teammates had to come on like they were on fire.

"Stanford's a good team so we

Bruins celebrate sweet taste of success

M. BASKETBALL: In fight to the finish, toughened team proves that they're not afraid of big, bad Wolverines

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

ATLANTA — The Bruins did something Sunday that they hadn't been able to accomplish all season long.

They played solid basketball ... for 40 minutes.

The Bruins' best basketball game of the season came on a timely occasion, as they kept their season alive by upsetting Michigan, 85-82, in the second round of the NCAA tournament.

"We definitely played 40 minutes of good basketball," senior guard Toby Bailey said. "I am so happy with the way everybody played – we left it all out on the court."

And as a reward, UCLA (24-8) earns a trip to St. Petersburg, Fla., and a date with second-seeded Kentucky in the South regional semifinals next weekend.

The upset of the third-seeded Wolverines (25-9) came only two days after the Bruins survived a first-round nail-biter with Miami. In much the same fashion as its first-round victory, UCLA used clutch free-throw shooting to clinch the win.

Kris Johnson made eight consecutive free throws over the final 38 seconds to close out the victory that shocked the 19,423 fans on hand at the Georgia Dome.

But free-throw shooting was about the only thing the two games had in common. While UCLA trailed Miami by 10 points early in the first half, the Bruins came out on fire against Michigan.

"(Against Miami) we got the first game out of our system," Johnson said. "But, before this game, we were feeling really good, and we're ready to go and give a

ATLANTA — "I put my foot on the nail, one (bounce), two, three, four, five, breath out, then shoot," said Kris Johnson explaining his ritual from the free-throw line.

The game plan was simple – get it to Johnson, who would then draw the foul, go through his motions and sink the two free throws.

The sixth-seeded UCLA men's basketball team (24-8) was hanging on to a tenuous lead in the last moments of the game. With less than a minute to go, third-seeded Michigan cut the once 10-point Bruin lead to five.

Toby Bailey would miss the front end of a one-and-one, and Johnson would miss two double bonus free throws. The Wolverines' Louis Bullock would make a layup and pull Michigan (25-9) within three with 38 seconds left.

"We wanted to make sure that we had the opportunity to get the basketball," Michigan head coach Brian Ellerbee said. "You need possessions."

Knowing that the Wolverines would foul, the Bruins kept inbounding the ball to their best free thrower, Johnson, who was immediately fouled.

"When I missed those first two, I was just like, 'I can't believe I did that,' because I hadn't missed two in a row the whole year," Johnson said. "But after I missed those two, I kind of got more focused and I told myself, 'I'm not bricking anymore free throws.'"

W. BASKETBALL: Loss to Alabama in final second creates controversy

By Stanley L. Johnson, Jr.
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

TUSCALOOSA, Ala. – Whoever said that time is not of the essence lied. With less than .8 of a second remaining in regulation, the No. 7-seeded UCLA women's basketball team suffered a controversial 75-74 loss to No. 2-seed University of Alabama, ending their chance of advancing to the Sweet 16 of the 1998 NCAA Tournament Sunday at Coleman Coliseum.

The controversy began after the Crimson Tide's Latoya Caudle hit an 18-footer with less than .8 seconds to go. What became the topic of discussion stemmed from a Britney Ezelle pass that was touched twice by two Bruin defenders before landing in Caudle's hand. Since the ball was touched twice, the .8 of a second should have elapsed, which would cleary have given the Bruins the victory.

UCLA's head coach Kathy Olivier expressed her sentiments about the controversy.

"I am not convinced that the tape shows that they won," Olivier said.

The final decision was made by Tina Cheatham, a representative from the NCAA. In a telephone conversation with Mary Weston, the Supervisor for Officiating for the NCAA Championships, Cheatham expressed that the rules could not be changed once the officials ended the game.

"You cannot go back and change what the officials reported," Cheatham said. "We cannot go back and view the entire 28 minutes of the tape."

Rule No. 2, Section 5 of the "NCAA's Men's and Women's Basketball Rules and Interpretations" handbook on "Officials and Their Duties" states that "Replay equipment or television monitoring may be used only in situations involved in preventing or rectifying a scorer's or timer's mistake or malfunctioning game or shot clocks

March Madness afflicts all with basketball addiction

"I got a basketball jones." This song by Chris Rock explains why many people across the nation, whether they be a men or a women, are glued to their TV sets for March Madness.

A basketball jones is a bad disease. It's a sort of airborne biological virus. Once you get a hit, you are locked down. Your brain cells become directed to one thing: basketball. You eat, you live, you dream NCAA basketball. You can't get enough.

Having a basketball jones is like being in love – with hope, elation and sadness. Nothing can stop you from watching the games, not even that 10-page paper due the next day.

Half of emergency loan repaid

ASUCLA: Students' association will have to borrow money again

By Michael Weiner
Daily Bruin Contributor

The students' association (ASUCLA) paid back $400,000 of its $800,000 emergency line of credit which it borrowed from the university and plans to pay back the rest of the money soon.

However, the association will have to re-borrow the second $400,000 some time this summer, said ASUCLA Chief Financial Officer Rich Delia.

He said that the association will pay back the remaining $400,000 soon. "We intend to pay that other $400,000 within the next six months," Delia said.

The loan is constructed such that whenever ASUCLA's bank balance rises over $1 million, the association must pay back some of the loan. When its balance falls below that amount, it can re-borrow money from the university.

ASUCLA Executive Director Patricia Eastman would rather that the loan was constructed such that ASUCLA would not have to re-borrow money, that the association would pay back the entire line of credit when it became financially sound. Under this scenario, ASUCLA's balance would not dip below $1 million, even during seasonal lows.

"That certainly would have been my preference on how to structure the loan," she said.

But Assistant Vice Chancellor Sue Santon, who handles ASUCLA's line of credit for the university, said that the loan is for an emergency

Initiative will put bilingual programs to the test

EDUCATION: If passed, Prop. 227 would totally eliminate California's current system

By Karla Pleitez
Daily Bruin Contributor

The faith of California voters in bilingual education will be put to the test on the June ballot.

An initiative: "Children in Public Schools," written by Ron Unz, chairman of One Nation/One California, and Gloria Matta Tuchman, a Santa Ana educator, was subtitled the Unz initiative and is now Proposition 227.

This initiative proposes to completely rid California of bilingual education programs.

Bilingual education consists of a bilingual teacher, who fosters the growth of the child's acquisition of English by using the child's native language as a tool while mandatory time is set aside for English instruction.

After three to five years, students are then completely immersed in English-only instruction.

Proposition 227 argues that the best method to teach children English is by only teaching them in English and not using the child's native language.

However, former bilingual education teacher and current UCLA Law and Urban Planning graduate student, Jeff Hilger, believes bilingual education is vital and is the best method to use so that the child acquires the English language quickly and effectively.

Educational experts believe it is absurd to try to force a foreign language upon a child without offering the child's mind a "mainstream into the English language."

The initiative sets a "sheltered English immersion (for) a temporary immersion period not to exceed one year." This criteria, Unz has noted, is based on "common sense."

However, statistics have proven that chil-

TRIP: Proposal hopes to equip South Africa with college retention programs, further develop UCLA internationally

By Dennis Lim

Officials in USAC have asked the administration for roughly $12,000 to cover the cost of a proposed trip to South Africa this April.

The trip would be the first step in a program called "Project South Africa" to develop retention programs in South African colleges.

"The goal of the program would be to help student governments in South Africa develop retention programs of their own," said Chad Williams, the African Student Union president and one of the signers of the proposal.

"The Campus Retention Committee here at UCLA is considered the best in the nation," he said. "We want to help (student leaders in Africa) develop their own retention programs to mirror ours."

If the proposal is approved, the group going to South Africa would consist of five to seven people, with members from the CRC, USAC, the administration and the Daily Bruin.

The representatives would travel to the Guanteng Province, the area of South Africa which includes Johannesburg, where much of the struggle against apartheid has taken place.

The petition comes at a time when certain administrators are also planning a trip to South Africa. Their trip, planned for next week, has a more exploratory goal than the student trip.

The administrators going on the trip hope to help the Building a better human? With the recent controversy surrounding cloning, the realization of genetic engineering may lie just over the horizon.

And according to the organizers of "Engineering the Human Germline," a free symposium being offered at UCLA on Friday, these kinds of medical technologies may not be as far away as many think.

"I don't think many understand how powerful this is," said Dr. Lee Silver, professor of genetics at Princeton University and a scheduled speaker at the symposium.

"Most people, I think, don't yet appreciate that we are going to be able to modify human beings."

Dr. Gregory Stock, a symposium organizer and director of the Science, Technology and Society Program with UCLA's Center for the Study of Evolution and the Origin of Life, said genetic engineering has already been realized on the level of individual cells but that, "you can imagine a lot more things that you can do with somatic engineering."

"As we get into more sophisticated things we will probably end up using germline engineering," Stock said.

Germline engineering involves the alteration of DNA in the egg or sperm cell, while somatic engineering involves the alteration of DNA in the individual cells. Changes made in the egg and sperm cells cause traits to be transmitted to future generations.

"(This) is the ultimate way that genetic information is going to provide benefits to people," said Dr. John Campbell, professor of neurobiology and co-organizer for the symposium.

Bruins celebrate sweet taste of success

M. BASKETBALL: In fight to the finish, toughened team proves that they're not afraid of big, bad Wolverines

ATLANTA — The Bruins did something Sunday that they hadn't been able to accomplish all season long.

They played solid basketball ... for 40 minutes.

The Bruins' best basketball game of the season came on a timely occasion, as they kept their season alive by upsetting Michigan, 85-82, in the second round of the NCAA tournament.

"We definitely played 40 minutes of good basketball," senior guard Toby Bailey said. "I am so happy with the way everybody played – we left it all out on the court."

COMMUNITY BRIEFS

Statistics show fewer minorities admitted

UC officials said Monday that the elimination of the university's affirmative action policies is chiefly responsible for the decrease in underrepresented students admitted so far this year to the system's campuses.

The UC Regents' 1995 decision to ban racial preferences in university hiring and admissions was followed by the passage of Proposition 209, a statewide ballot measure mandating the elimination of affirmative action in the public realm. University officials said the decline in the number of minority students admitted reflects the passage of these policies.

Admissions statistics for fall 1998 released earlier this week from five schools – UC Davis, UC Irvine, UC Riverside, UC Santa Cruz and UC San Diego – indicate an overall decline in the number of minority students accepted.

Although UC Santa Cruz and UC Riverside both reported an increase in the admissions of African American students, other campuses, which are more limited in space, saw a significant drop in African American and students from other ethnic groups.

UC San Diego experienced a 40 percent decrease in the percentage of underrepresented students admitted this year compared to the numbers for last fall, while Davis admitted 35.9 percent fewer African Americans and 27.7 percent fewer Latinos.

Irvine recorded a slighter decrease in the number of minority students admitted, accepting 19 percent fewer African Americans and 5 percent fewer Latinos compared to last year.

Pat Jacoby, director of university outreach at UC San Diego, said she felt there was a causal relationship between the anti-affirmative action stance of the university and the sharp drop in UC San Diego's admission of underrepresented students.

"In the absence of affirmative action, we had to use different criteria, such as community service and economic background," she said. "Everybody expected it to be a drop and (the admissions numbers) may have been in the neighborhood of what was expected."

Meanwhile, UC Riverside officials cited the lack of historical affirmative action measures within their university – rendered unnecessary due to the room created by its growth in capacity – as a factor in the 41.9 percent and 30.9 percent increase in African American and Latino students, respectively, admitted to their campus this year.

But university officials stressed that the figures were preliminary numbers, noting that admissions reports from other UC campuses, including UC Berkeley and UCLA, have not been made available yet.

Huge meteorites hit Powell library

Until March 27, Powell Library will be home to a collection of meteorites. In celebration of the acquisition of the 123-pound Anoka meteorite, UCLA is bringing out a selection of meteorites from the university's collection.

The 15 specimens of meteorites will be taken from UCLA's collection of 620, the fifth largest in the United States.

The Anoka meteorite was discovered when a trench was dug for a water line in Champlin, Minnesota. The iron meteorite was acquired by a consortium of institutions, including the University of Minnesota, Harvard University, the Smithsonian, and the Natural History Museum of London.

The meteor will be shared between the institutions for further study.

UCLA's collection of meteorites has grown to its current size as a result of the work of professor John Wasson and researcher Alan Rubin.

Funding has been provided from the Institute of Geophysics and Planetary Physics, and the Division of Physical Science in the College of Letters and Sciences.

In 10 years, will you care?

Stress is a biological reaction to dangerous situations that can overwhelm students. So don't panic. Learning takes commitment, not cramming.

By Adam Wolfson
Daily Bruin Contributor

Feelings of pressure because of too much work are all too common. The thought that there is not enough time to finish that paper permeates almost every student's life at least once.

But why does a person allow the situation get to the extremes? Humans are supposed to learn from their mistakes, right?

"I just get to a point where I feel that I haven't prepared enough," says Autumn Harrison, a first-year undeclared student, "and that makes me not concentrate."

This scenario seems to be a major factor in many student's lives. The almost inevitable buildup of readings, chapters and information is a commonplace occurrence on campus.

"In high school you could slack off and still ace the test," said Daniel Rothblum, first-year Jewish studies student. "You can't do that here."

According to Dr. Karl Hempel, a physician in Florida, stress is the result of a human's natural "fight or flight" response. This response refers to the theory that, as humans evolved, the body had to have a way to react quickly to hostile situations. When confronted with a difficult situation, the human body gets a surge of adrenaline that prepares the body for a physically challenging event.

This response was meant to be used infrequently. Unfortunately, people today often perceive their surroundings as hostile a good part of the time, leading to many physiological changes in the body.

Common symptoms of stress include headaches, insomnia, low energy levels, irritability, poor concentration and the inability to relax. People who are stressed often find themselves constantly clenching their jaws or grinding their teeth. Also, muscle tension is a common result.

If people find themselves with any of these symptoms, it could be an indication that they are overly stressed. The most important thing is to find some way of relieving the stress.

Tom Wheatley, a professor in the theater department, is an expert in preparing actors to be calm. According to him, there are three kinds of stress: physical, mental and psychological. Each one is separate, but the ways to relieve them are all interrelated.

"When studying, you might start to get really stressed and stop concentrating," he says. "If you sit back and stretch and take a few deep breaths, even though that is a physical act, it can help your mental state."

Some ways to relieve stress, according to Wheatley, are meditation (for your mental stress), stretching for the physical and to perhaps "psych yourself up" for the test.

"If you don't believe you can pass that test, you probably won't," he says.

Another problem Wheatley cites is the way students study. If you could be studying all the time, he says, and relaxing all the time, and putting your self in a good mood, it would definitely help. Also, cramming tends to cause more stress and make one do worse on a test.

Some people are lucky. No matter what, they are able to keep the stress out of their lives.

ACADEMICS: LAPD hopes program will stimulate student interest in policy

By Katie Sierra
Daily Bruin contributor

The Rodney King beating and the ensuing riots of 1992 were two major events that pressured the Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD) to reform.

This interest in reform will be the subject of a new class at UCLA called "Public Organizations at the Crossroads: Transforming the Los Angeles Police Department."

The class will be offered spring quarter through the Graduate School of Education & Information Studies along with the School of Public Policy and Social Research.

Professor Wellford Wilms and Deputy Chief of Police and Chief of Staff of the LAPD David Gascon will co-teach the class.

Wilms felt that this class was necessary because large public organizations have very little theory to guide them when it comes to implementing changes.

"I've been studying the LAPD for the last four years. It's a fascinating, big, public organization struggling to adapt to a changing environment," Wilms said.

Wilms and Gascon met through their work studying the LAPD. Wilms created the class and recruited Gascon to help him because of his vast experience with the LAPD.

"Gascon's been on the force for 25 or 30 years. He's been in the hot seat a lot. He's a very serious senior guy who students can learn from," Wilms said.

The class will focus on the differences that exist between private and public organizations.

Private organizations such as businesses and industries are strongly affected by a changing environment. The lecturers will try to determine how these same environmental changes are translated to public organizations, with the LAPD as a prime example. The class is specifically interested in looking at how public organizations such as the LAPD respond to outside pressures for reform.

"Whether we want to look at reengineering, redesign or strategic planning as key issues that the LAPD must consider in improving its public image, we must necessarily look at the changing environment of the Los Angeles area and the public policy area," said Xochitl Perez, a student enrolled in the course.

The class will also look at specific changes that are occurring in the LAPD and try to determine how these changes are carried out at the street level patrol. The public has called for a larger and more technologically competent police force.

One large change within the department has been the gradual move away from their more traditional policing techniques.

Jetsun Pema comes to UCLA to raise funds for education

PROFILE: Dalai Lama's sister is president of the Children's Village

By Emi Kojima
Daily Bruin Contributor

She is a soft-spoken woman with a slight British accent, who is called "Ama La" (mother) by thousands of Tibetan children.

Jetsun Pema, a sister of the Dalai Lama, serves as a mother figure to the Tibetan people both in the country and in exile.

Pema's brother, the Dalai Lama, serves as the political and spiritual leader of Tibet. They currentiy live in exile in India, where she is the president of the Tibetan Children's Village (TCV). Pema recently published her autobiography, "Tibet, My Story," a best-seller in Europe.

TCV currently looks after 27,000 refugees, children and adults. Many of the children are orphans whose parents pay smugglers to bring their children over the Himalayan mountains to India.

Children have been crossing the Himalayas in order to reach TCV and the education, cultural awareness and opportunities that it provides.

"Two years ago, a little boy of five years old arrived," Pema said. "He lost all of his toes."

Pema lectured at UCLA twice this week to raise funds for the education of Tibetan children in exile and for Tibetan rights.

Rinchon Dharlo, president of the Tibet Fund, said the group wanted to promote awareness of Tibetan issues.

"Mrs. Pema is known to six million Tibetan people, not because she is exalted as the Dalai Lama's sister but because of her work and dedication serving children for the last 35 years," Dharlo said.

The problems in Tibet began in 1949 with the Chinese invasion. The Dalai Lama left Tibet in 1959 and went into exile in India after hearing that Chinese troops were preparing to bombard the Dalai Lama's palace.

"There are gross violations of human rights in Tibet," Pema said, "Tibetans are treated as second-class citizens."

The Dalai Lama established a government in exile. Pema later joined the Dalai Lama in Dharamsala.

He founded TCV in 1960 as a nursery for Tibetan children. Pema took charge of the operation when her brother appointed her president, four years later.

Her work with the program has shown tangible results. Now 99 percent of all Tibetan children in exile attend school and the TCV has a 75 percent literacy rate.

"Our top priority was the education of Tibetan children," Pema said. "We felt it was the best thing to do in exile. Future children will be the seed to a future Tibet."

She is touring the United States in order to gather money to expand TCV donations.

Pema has already been to Berkeley, Stanford and UC Santa Barbara. She continues from Los Angeles to San Diego, Orange County, Chicago and Denver.

Pema's first lecture was held during a dinner Tuesday with a requested $100 minimum donation. Wednesday she delivered a free lecture to the public.

The UCLA Department of Psychiatry and the Tibet Fund sponsored the lectures.

The psychiatry department invited Pema to speak at UCLA because psychiatrists have been examining Tibetan medicine in order to cure some psychiatric illnesses.

"Tibetan views are striking in their parallels with some modern science," said Charles Raison, assistant clinical professor and director of emergency psychiatric services.

The Tibet Fund encouraged attendees to sponsor a Tibetan child at TCV by donating $30 a month.

Recently, Tibet has gathered more media attention with the Tibetan Freedom Concert, given by modern rock performers. Pema even played a role in the American film "Seven Years in Tibet" as the Dalai Lama's mother.

International support for Tibet is imperative, Pema said. Already there are 300 support groups in 30 different countries.

She hopes that Tibetan support group can help to "bring about dialogue with the Chinese and Tibetan governments so that the Tibetan problem can be solved through peaceful means."

Pema was the first woman to be elected as a minister on the cabinet of the exiled Tibetan government.

In 1995 she was given the title "Mother of Tibet" by the Assembly of the Tibetan People's Deputies in exile.

"She is humble and non-assuming," said Hank Turley, the coordinator if the Western Tour for the Tibet Fund.

"Basically no one in the west knows what she has done for 50,000 children," he said.

Because of the strong role she has played in both the TCV and in the government, she has also served as a role model for women.

"In the homes, we (are) the boss, all right," she jokingly said.

She said that women have played an increasingly vocal role in Tibetan politics. Now there are two women on the cabinet and 12 in their parliament of 46.

She traveled back to Tibet in 1980, accompanied by Chinese officials.

"What was most shocking, more than the terrible stories I have heard was the thinking that the Tibetan people should be treated like animals and (that they) had no feelings," she said.

Pema, however, still maintains that the Tibetan government in exile supports non-violent tactics.

"Young people always will feel impatient. There have been over 200 demonstrations against the Chinese government within Tibet that have been clamped down," she said.

Wildfires threaten Indian way of life, rain forest animals

BRAZIL: Firefighters try to stop blaze, but dry conditions fuel flames

By Michael Astor
The Associated Press

THE YANOMAMI RESERVATION, Brazil – The midday sun burns red through the smoke rising from dozens of forest fires. For the Yanomami Indians, it's a sign of the apocalypse – and environmentalists fear they may be right.

One 3-month-old fire is raging out of control just across the Mucajai River, where firefighters are struggling to protect the Yanomamis from the worst conflagration in the history of this remote Amazon region.

But it may be too late. Dozens of smaller fires already are burning unchecked inside the 25-million-acre reservation that is home to the world's largest Stone Age tribe.

Baby jaguars, separated from their mothers, lope along the road, past mile after mile of scorched forest. The fires are scaring away the game that sustains the reservation's 9,000 Indians.

"The turtles and the armadillos are disappearing. We have food for now, but I'm worried about later on," said Antonio Yanomami, who uses the tribe's name as a surname.

So far, no Indians have died in the fire. But at least three malocas, or grass-covered huts, have burned down, said Manuel Canuto da Silva, who runs the Federal Indian Bureau post at Jaranei, 120 miles southwest of the Roraima state capital of Boa Vista.

The sun glows red through the ghostly shroud of smoke, making the Yanomami uneasy.

"This is the sign of the apocalypse for them," said Guilherme Danoli, an Italian priest who has lived among the Yanomami since 1989. "They are beating on the walls of their houses to exorcise the evil spirits."

Others perform the Xabori ritual, drawing on the ground and chanting to bring rain.

"The rains will come tomorrow," Antonio asserts. Modern forecasters are less confident – they don't expect rain before mid-April.

Barely one-twentyfifth of an inch has fallen this year in Roraima, a wedge of land between Venezuela and Guyana. The unusual dry spell is the work of El Niño, a warming of waters in the Pacific that changes weather patterns worldwide.

"This summer is very strong. It's not like the other, weaker summers. We Yanomami call this 'Tupan,'" explains Chief Davi Copenawa

JAPAN: Post-traumatic stress plagues those who took the subway on that fateful day three years ago

By Mari Yamaguchi

TOKYO – Miori Noguchi's dreams usually start out peacefully enough – cows grazing in a pasture, a happy young bride at a wedding reception.

But then terrible, unexpected things start to happen. The cows start bleeding. The bride is suddenly sprawled on a stretcher, an IV stuck in her arm.

Like thousands of other victims of a nerve gas attack on the Tokyo subway three years ago Friday, Noguchi continues to suffer.

And like much of Japan, she still awaits closure.

"I don't know how I survived the last three years," she said in an interview, nervously wiping her face as she recalled the attack by the Aum Shinri Kyo (Supreme Truth) cult.

The attack by the doomsday cult, the worst act of terror in modern-day Japan, shattered the nation's traditional sense of safety.

Driving hard bargain not enough to curb Pentagon's overspending

GOVERNMENT: System designed to save money results in inflated prices

By John Diamond
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – More news from the home of the $640 toilet seat: The Pentagon's watchdog said Wednesday that a new purchasing system designed to save money produced millions of dollars in overpriced spare parts, including a $76 screw and a $714 electrical bell.

Inspector General Eleanor Hill, who monitors waste and fraud at the Defense Department, said two audits found that the problem wasn't caused by contractor gouging, seen in past abuses but by Pentagon errors.

She said that while employing a new purchasing system similar to that used in the commercial sector, Pentagon buyers failed to drive a hard bargain, neglected to find parts that were available from competitors for lower prices and bought large quantities of parts without getting bulk discounts.

"Department of Defense procurement approaches were poorly conceived, badly coordinated and did not result in the government getting good value for the prices paid both for commercial and noncommercial items," Hill told a Senate Armed Services subcommittee.

"We found considerable evidence that the Department of Defense had not yet learned how to be an astute buyer in the commercial market place," she said.

The Pentagon's acquisition chief, Jacques S. Gansler, told senators that the audit found "isolated instances" in a new system that has saved taxpayers money while purchasing tens of billions of dollars worth of equipment.

"In the overwhelming majority of cases, using commercial practices and buying commercial items has paid huge dividends," Gansler said.

The inspector general said the review was based on tips received on a fraud hotline about purchases from two contractors.

But Hill said neither contractor, Sundstrand Corp. of Rockford, Ill., or Seattle-based Boeing Co., violated any laws. And Boeing said it charged the Pentagon the same prices advertised to price-conscious commercial airlines.

Nonetheless, Hill cited several examples of overpriced parts:

•$714 each for 108 electrical bells previously priced at $47.

•$5.41 for each of 1,844 screw thread inserts, compared to a previous price of 29 cents.

•$1.24 for each of 31,108 springs previously priced at five cents.

•$75.60 for each of 187 set screws previously priced at 57 cents.

•$403 each for 246 actuator sleeves priced earlier at $24.72.

"This is a story that looks a whole lot worse than it is," said Boeing spokesman Dick Dalton. "There isn't a suggestion of any improper activity on Boeing's part."

The lower prices cited by the audits, Dalton said, date back 15 to South Korea pressing for details of talks

GENEVA – South Korean negotiators pressed their North Korean counterparts today to spell out their conditions for direct peace talks.

China, which is chairing this week's four-way talks with the United States and North and South Korea, called in the heads of delegations for a closed session today.

The main aim of the talks is to draw up a permanent peace treaty to replace the armistice ending the 1950-53 Korean War.

The North has in the past refused to recognize the government in Seoul, saying it is merely a puppet regime installed by the United States. The North wanted to deal instead with the United States, bypassing Seoul altogether.

The North has also attached conditions to any offer of holding talks. In the past, it has demanded that the United States first withdraw 37,000 troops stationed in South Korea before talks could move forward.

In Seoul, South Korea, Foreign Minister Park Chung-soo told the Cabinet that the North had signaled its desire for direct discussions with the South's new government.

South Korean President Kim Dae-jung welcomed the North Korea's move, stating that "the door to inter-Korea dialogue is always open," presidential officials said.

Relations between the two Koreas have been frozen for the past several years, with North Korea branding previous South Korean President Kim Young-sam as a U.S. puppet.

Minnesotans propose secession to Canada

WASHINGTON – Get out your maps. Congress was asked Wednesday to consider giving Canada part of the United States, an obscure appendage of Minnesota named the Northwest Angle.

It's the half-serious, some say half-baked, idea of resort owners in the Angle to get the Clinton administration to intervene in their dispute with neighboring Ontario over the province's fishing restrictions.

Rep. Collin Peterson, D-Minn., proposed an amendment to the U.S. Constitution that would allow the Angle's 100 residents to vote on whether they want to secede.

The Northwest Angle, which was created out of confusion among mapmakers about where the headwaters of the Mississippi River lay, consists of 120 square miles of land and part of the Lake of the Woods, a prime place for fishing walleye.

The Angle's resort owners have had a number of complaints over the years about fishing regulations on the Ontario portions of the lake. The latest restriction was the last straw, the Americans say. Beginning Jan. 1, no one can keep walleye taken from the Ontario side without spending at least one night in an Ontario-based resort.

Teen charged with computer hacking

BOSTON – A teenager accused of crippling an airport control tower has become the first juvenile charged in federal court with computer hacking.

The U.S. Justice Department said Wednesday that the Massachusetts boy, whose name, age and hometown were not disclosed, has agreed to plead guilty.

If a judge accepts the plea bargain, the boy will get two years' probation, a fine and community service. He will also be banned from using a computer with a modem for two years.

The boy broke into a Bell Atlantic computer system on March 10, 1997, causing a system crash that knocked out power at Worcester Airport. Communication between the tower and aircraft was disrupted for six hours.

No accidents or close calls resulted.

Judge strikes down Prop. 187

COURTS: Law denying benefits to immigrants found unconstitutional

By Dennis Anderson
The Associated Press

Proposition 187, California's voter-approved law to deny benefits to undocumented immigrants, is unconstitutional from top to bottom, a federal judge concluded in a ruling made public Wednesday.

In November, U.S. District Judge Mariana Pfaelzer struck down most provisions of the measure, which voters passed overwhelmingly in 1994. This week, she got rid of the rest of it.

The latest parts struck down involved denial of benefits to immigrants in the state's college and university systems. The decision also struck down elements involving denial of access to health care and social services.

At least five lawsuits were filed against the state after passage of Proposition 187 in 1994. They were consolidated into one federal action and assigned to Pfaelzer.

The state initiative, approved by 59 percent of voters, has never been implemented because of the court challenges.

Gov. Pete Wilson, a staunch supporter of Proposition 187, vowed an appeal of Pfaelzer's decision.

"Her analysis of the measure is fundamentally flawed," Wilson said in a statement. "This action will allow us to finally appeal her decision to the Ninth Circuit so that the will of the people can be upheld."

Under the measure, undocumented immigrants were to be denied education, welfare and non-emergency health care. Public employees, including teachers, were to report undocumented immigrants to authorities.

In her November ruling, the judge concluded the proposition was unconstitutional because it attempts to regulate immigration, which only the federal government can do.

"The states have no power to legislate in this area," the judge reiterated in the decision issued late Tuesday.

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) branded the final decision "an overwhelming victory."

"This is literally the last nail in the coffin," said Mark Rosenbaum, legal director of the ACLU of Southern California. The ruling meant "teachers and doctors are

Mayors plead with president to keep marijuana clubs open

LAWSUIT: Proponents say centers are necessary to keep patients off streets

By Ron Harris
The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO – Four California mayors say the streets will be safer if President Clinton drops a federal lawsuit to close the clubs that dispense medical marijuana.

Mayors of San Francisco, Oakland, Santa Cruz and West Hollywood, in letters dated March 12 to March 17, said closing the clubs would hurt those suffering from AIDS and cancer who use the drug to ease their pain and nausea.

"If the centers are shut down, many of these individuals will be compelled to search back alleys and street corners for their medicine," the mayors wrote in letters to the president.

The mayors also asked the president to drop an injunction against the operation of the clubs, authorized by a voter-approved initiative, by state voters and "implement a moratorium on enforcement of federal drug laws that interfere with the daily operation of the dispensaries."

A White House spokesman, after checking with the office of drug policy, said there is nothing planned on medical marijuana in California.

Outside San Francisco's Cannabis Cultivators' Club, Joel Whalen smoked a joint while waiting for the club to open. He is HIV positive and supports the mayors' efforts.

"With the mayors backing us, I think it's a lot better," said Whalen, who uses marijuana to boost his appetite. "I quit all intravenous drugs, and now that I've been smok-

House blocks resolution to pull troops out of Bosnia

CONGRESS: Administration asks for $2.5 billion more to further finance peace-keeping operation

By Barry Schweid
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Clinton administration told a dubious Congress Wednesday it had a legal right to keep thousands of American soldiers on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia without a pullout deadline and asked for nearly $2.5 billion to finance the operation through September 1999.

Within hours, the House voted 225-193 against a hotly fought resolution that would have forced President Clinton to withdraw U.S. troops from Bosnia or get permission from Congress to leave them there.

Defense Secretary William Cohen and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright defended the peacekeeping operation as constitutional in testimony before the House National Security Committee.

Cohen said the troops in Bosnia-Herzegovina, overseeing a 1995 settlement arranged by the United States to end a 3 1/2-year ethnic war, were unlikely to face hostile fire.

The defense secretary acknowledged it would have been politically wise to urge Congress to approve a resolution supporting the U.S. military involvement in the former Yugoslavia. But the troops in Bosnia, which he said would be reduced from 8,500 to 6,900, were not "in harm's way."

Later, the House rejected a measure by Rep. Tom Campbell, R-Calif., designed to test the constitutionality of the 1973 War Powers Act, which requires presidents to seek congressional approval when sending U.S. forces into combat. The law was adopted by Congress as America's bloody combat role in Vietnam was winding down, but presidents of both parties since have found ways to sidestep it.

Campbell said it was time to get a clear ruling on the law. "We decide whether we should put troops in force overseas," he said.

But leaders of both parties suggested it would send the wrong signals to the rest of the world and to U.S. troops in Bosnia.

"I urge our colleagues not to undermine ...

Defense Department criticized for giving faulty supplies to drug war

MEXICO: Though nation has cooperated, little done to end problems

By Jim Abrams
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Three weeks after the State Department certified that Mexico is cooperating in the war on drugs, a government investigator said Wednesday that little has been done to stop the flow of drugs and both the United States and Mexico are to blame.

Benjamin F. Nelson of the General Accounting Office, the investigative wing of Congress, singled out the Defense Department for supplying Mexico with drug-fighting planes and helicopters that have been largely ineffective.

Nelson, director of international relations and trade issues for the GAO, told a joint House-Senate hearing that while Mexico took steps over the last year to improve its drug-fighting capability, "no (Mexican) national has actually been surrendered to the United States on drug charges, new laws are not fully implemented" and building a competent law enforcement system "continues to be a major challenge."

"No country poses a more immediate narcotics threat to the United States than Mexico," he said.

Lawmakers at the hearing were even harsher in dismissing U.S.-Mexican efforts. Bilateral border task forces, said Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., "have been a failure in every respect."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said there are "gaping holes" in the counternarcotics effort and "ignoring these failures or pretending they are outweighed by modest advances doesn't make them go away."

Feinstein said the Senate could vote as early as next week on a measure to overturn the administration's decision last month to certify Mexico as cooperating in combatting drugs.

The president by law must decide by March 1 every year whether Mexico and other nations are cooperating partners in efforts to stop the production or shipment of narcotics. Those not certified face the

Cuts, policy cause maneuvering

CONGRESS: Both parties jockey for position, run gamut of budget issues

By Jim Abrams
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – House Republican leaders have decided that additional spending to pay for missions in Bosnia and the Persian Gulf must be fully paid for by cutting domestic programs.

That agreement came as a key Senate committee approved, with conditions, $1.8 billion to keep troops in Bosnia past June and to maintain U.S. troops in the Gulf on full alert.

The Senate Appropriations Committee also endorsed, by an identical 26-2 vote, an $18 billion package for the International Monetary Fund. That legislation, which also came with conditions, is considered essential to IMF efforts to rescue the faltering economies of Asia.

In the House, GOP leaders resolved that any extra spending for Bosnia and the Gulf this year must be matched with similar spending cuts so there is no effect on the budget.

"The leadership unanimously agreed the ... (spending) would be paid for, and the cuts would not come out of defense," said Majority Leader Dick Armey, R-Texas.

Republicans, in choosing programs for spending reductions, are likely to target Democratic and White House priorities, setting the stage for sharp clashes as Congress tries over the coming weeks to craft future budgets.

The Senate is moving two separate spending bills, one for the IMF and the other for the military operations plus some $610 million for disaster relief and $196 million to help fix the year 2000 computer problems at the Federal Aviation Administration and the Treasury Department.

Both came with conditions that are opposed by the administration.

Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota said Wednesday that with the GOP leadership at odds over whether to submit one bill or two and whether to insert contentious abortion language, the chance of action is "about as bleak as it gets."

He said Senate Democrats would go along with the House idea of offsetting new defense spending with cuts elsewhere and still want to see a comprehensive bill that also would included money for paying U.S. back dues to the United Nations. "To separate out and further delay IMF and U.N. considerations is a real mistake, and it sends all the wrong messages," Daschle said.

The defense bill urges President Clinton to pressure U.S. allies to cover more of the costs of the Iraq effort.

"I think we're shouldering a disproportionately large share of the burden," said Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., who promoted the measure.

The IMF bill comes attached with directions on pressuring the Fund into reforming some of its

Minister to oppose law on domestic partner coverage

BENEFITS: Fred Phelps known for in-your-face anti-gay confrontations

By Rachel Gordon
San Francisco Examiner

SAN FRANCISCO – A Baptist minister from Kansas plans to protest in front of San Francisco City Hall on the first anniversary of a law that extends insurance and other benefits to gay or lesbian partners of employees.

The announcement by the Rev. Fred Phelps, pastor of the Westboro Baptist Church in Topeka, Kan., comes as the city is defending the law in federal court against challenges brought by companies.

Phelps is known for his rancorous rhetoric aimed at gays and lesbians. He has picketed at the funerals of people who died of AIDS and embraces public confrontations with gays and their supporters.

San Francisco's domestic partners law requires companies that do business with the city to provide the same benefits to their workers with domestic partners as they do to married couples. The law took effect last June.

"Don't get mad, but you guys need to be preached to, my dear," Phelps told a reporter Tuesday. "You're not only letting the homosexuals take over the Bay Area, but the rest of the country."

In a letter addressed to San Francisco Mayor Willie Brown, Phelps said he would lead a "religious protest" on June 1 with 15 to 20 church members.

Phelps, who said he had received death threats from San Francisco residents, asked the mayor for "adequate police presence and protection" for the protest.

Brown said he would not lay out the welcome mat for Phelps and his followers, but noted that officials would not try to stop the protest.

"But I will say that this demonstration will be in an extreme hostile environment," Brown said. He said police officers would be assigned to prevent

British Foreign Secretary heads to Damascus after snub from Israel

SYRIA: Netanyahu protesting Briton's meeting with Palestine

By Zeina Karam
The Associated Press

DAMASCUS, Syria – After being told in Israel that Europeans were too biased to be Mideast peacemakers, British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook traveled to Syria on Wednesday.

Europe's influence is vital to keeping up pressure on Israel, Syrian newspapers declared the morning of Robin Cook's arrival.

Following a stormy one-day stop in Israel, Cook got a much warmer welcome in Syria. He was met at the Damascus airport by Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa, then went into talks with President Hafez Assad on Israel's occupation of south Lebanon.

On Tuesday, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu snubbed Cook in protest of the Briton's meeting with Palestinian lawmakers at a much-disputed Jewish housing project in east Jerusalem.

Israel complained the meeting aided Palestinian claims to east Jerusalem as the future capital of a Palestinian state.

Cook is in the Middle East to encourage peace talks, which have been stalled since Israel broke ground on the housing project.

In Wednesday's meeting with Assad, the two leaders discussed Israel's recent offer to withdraw from the enclave it occupies in southern Lebanon in exchange for security guarantees. So far, both Lebanon and Syria have rejected the offer.

"We discussed how progress could be achieved towards ... ensuring a withdrawal of troops from Lebanon," while implementing U.N. resolutions demanding an unconditional pullback, Cook said.

"That is why I am here today – and why I am going from here to Beirut," he said. "The question is how we can make sure the security ... is maintained in the circumstances of withdrawal."

In Syria, government-run newspapers rejected Israeli demands that Cook and other Europeans stay out of Israeli-Palestinian affairs.

Cook, whose country holds the rotating presidency of the 15-nation European Union, said that Europe believes expansion of Jewish settlements are blocking the peace process.

practices such as ending subsidies "to favored enterprises and individuals."

In the House as well there is widespread support for conditioning the IMF money and putting limits on the Bosnia operation.

The House is scheduled to vote this week on a separate nonbinding resolution directing Clinton to remove troops from Bosnia within 60 days unless Congress enacts a declaration of war or specifically authorizes the use of American forces. The administration, abandoning its earlier goal of pulling all troops from Bosnia by June, now says some Americans will stay for the indefinite future.

Senate Republicans sidetracked a move to add to the spending bill a provision that would have prevented the Federal Communications Commission from giving candidates free or lower-cost broadcast time.

At the request of Appropriations Committee Chairman Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, the panel stripped a provision to block the FCC from carrying out Clinton's request to require broadcasters either to provide free time or give deeper discounts on ads than they do now. Republican critics say lawmakers should have the final say over the issue.

confrontations.

The Rev. Jim Mitulski, pastor of the predominantly gay Metropolitan Community Church in San Francisco, said he was disappointed that the Kansas minister was using the Bible "as a veil to justify his own bigotry."

But, he said, "when you scratch the surface of homophobia, you often find religion underneath."

The city's Human Rights Commission reports more than 1,500 companies doing business with the municipal government offer domestic partners benefits.

Still, several airlines are challenging the law on the grounds that only the federal government – not a municipality – can pass laws regulating air carriers.

STRESS

"I never really stress out," says David Samuel, second-year psychology student, "I was always like that. It's just not worth it."

One time, according to Samuel, a paper that he had thought would be finished by Sunday morning took him until right before his class the next morning to finish. He had two tests on Wednesday, but because he thought he would have been done with the paper, he hadn't even started studying.

"At first I started to flip out," Samuel said.

"Then I realized that that was just a waste of time and I got myself going."

Rick Barsh, a fifth-year history student, agrees. "My personal philosophy is, 'Don't be worried, be concerned," he said. "If you stay in touch with reality, you'll get a lot more done."

According to Barsh, he studies by setting realistic goals for himself. In one day, for example, he might tell himself that he wants to finish a chapter and some readings.

"It makes you feel like you've accomplished something," he says.

On their web site, Health and Wellness Dynamics, Inc. elaborate more on this goal-setting by suggesting that the people ask themselves three important questions: How much time do I need? How much time do I have to give? How much interest do I have in this subject?

When people take these questions into account, they are much more able to set goals and, therefore, diminish stress.

In general, stress is a process that affects the whole body. Hempel even uses college students as an example of stress in his "Health Gazette."

"This (stress) causes ... the immune system to begin to falter," he states. "An example of this would be college students studying for finals. They tend to have a high incidence of colds and other infections, because they stay up late and put their bodies through a lot of stress."

If one is able to work on their study habits, mental attitudes and outlook while studying for tests or writing papers, they will be more likely to do well and feel better about themselves.

"If your body is your enemy from the...start," says Wheatley, "you're not going to do well – period."

VICTIMS

Thousands were sickened and 12 people died.

The cult was also implicated in another nerve-gas attack in central Japan in 1994 that killed seven people; in the deaths of several wayward followers; the near fatal shooting of Japan's top police official; and the kidnapping and killing of an anti-cult lawyer and his family.

Police cracked down with unprecedented thoroughness. More than 400 of the cult's 10,000 members in Japan were arrested; 110 have since been convicted, and the cult was forced to disband.

Aum Shinri Kyo's commune at the foot of Mount Fuji has been seized, and the barrack-like structures that once stored chemicals, arms and drugs are now empty, awaiting demolition.

However, trials for dozens of key cult leaders, including founder Shoko Asahara, drag on. A verdict on Asahara may not come until the next decade.

Police say about 500 cult members remain faithful to Asahara, and are clandestinely carrying on cult rituals. They say the cult is far from the threat it once was, but admit signs of its resurgence are alarming.

The worst damage from the subway attack was probably on the Japanese psyche.

"On the surface, things seem to be back to normal," said Yutaka Aoyagi, spokesman for the Tokyo subway system. "But the horrible memory of that day easily returns to mind, especially this time of year."

Psychiatrist Kanzo Nakano said that lingering fear may finally be fading for most Japanese. But he said it may be getting worse for those who actually breathed the deadly sarin – a nerve gas developed by the Nazis in World War II– on March 20, 1995.

"Victims feel as if they are being left behind as the rest of the society forgets what happened to them," he said.

> "Victims (of the Tokyo nerve-gas attack) feel as if they are being left behind as the rest of the society forgets what happened to them."
> Kanzo Nakano
> Psychiatrist

Noguchi wonders if she will ever forget.

Her first physical reaction to the nerve gas was a throbbing throat and nausea. Then came sharp pains in her eyes and frequent nightmares. Her eyesight has been permanently weakened, and she now wears glasses.

She still has bouts of panic, and of gasping for air – symptoms diagnosed as post-traumatic stress disorder. She manages to distract herself with the help of a Walkman and medication.

About half of 285 victims surveyed recently by St. Luke's International Hospital in Tokyo said they continue to suffer from a vague sort of fatigue.

Thirty percent complained of chronic headaches, and more than 20 percent said they at times have dizziness, irregular breathing, nausea or loss of appetite.

The Labor Ministry has spent $2.6 million on medical expenses for the 3,692 victims of the subway attack.

The families of 18 people who died or were seriously injured in the subway attack or the 1994 gassing received $424,000 in compensation – about $23,535 apiece. But some 2,000 other victims, including housewives, children and others who were unemployed, were deemed ineligible.

Health and Welfare Ministry official Yuroyuki Doi said the government has not offered any comprehensive follow-up care or other support. He said the government isn't liable for what Aum Shinri Kyo did, and that if victims want compensation they must get it from the cult.

A group of 42 victims is suing the cult for damages, but almost certainly won't be able to collect, no matter what the court rules. The once wealthy cult is now bankrupt.

"Our lives have been completely turned around," said Shizue Takahashi, whose husband – a subway worker – died trying to help passengers reach safety above ground. "For the victims, nothing has changed."

COST

20 years and were based on a completely different supply system in which the Pentagon bought large quantities at cheaper prices and then bore the storage costs.

Under the new system, Boeing delivers parts in small quantities on short notice as needed. Such a system entails extra costs that show up in the price but it saves the buyer huge inventory expenses, Dalton said.

"These are parts that frequently require precision machining, aerospace tolerances and materials that are specifically for the aerospace industry," Dalton said.

In the case of Sundstrand, the Pentagon's Defense Logistics Agency bought items from the company catalog for higher prices than the military had previously paid for the same items.

The higher prices were paid, in part, because the agency failed to obtain cost data from Sundstrand, according to the audit. In addition, the Pentagon made repeated purchases, ultimately amounting to large quantities, without using its big-buyer leverage to demand discounts.

Hill, citing concerns about the release of proprietary information, did not release the actual audits. The audit summaries were obtained by The Associated Press.

The Sundstrand audit concerned $23 million in purchases of aircraft spare parts, including pistons, gearshifts, gears, bearing bolts and springs.

In one contract, the Pentagon paid $6.1 million for commercial parts that should have cost just $1.6 million under the Pentagon's "fair and reasonable" pricing standard, a 280 percent markup, the audit said.

A Sundstrand spokesman did not return a call seeking comment.

The Boeing audit focused on 179 delivery orders totaling $12 million for structural panels, fittings, supports, washers, nuts and bolts for a variety of aircraft. Most were parts for military and commercial versions of the Boeing 707.

On three contracts, the Pentagon paid Boeing $5 million for parts that the inspector general said should have cost $2.8 million.

Hill said the Pentagon would have been better served if it shopped around rather than entering into a sole-source contract. And she disputed Gansler's assertion that the problems were isolated.

"If they were making these assumptions on these cases, they were probably making them on other cases," Hill said.

not to become substitutes for immigration officers."

Rosenbaum said it was promising that no other state followed California's lead, particularly when California is a bellwether for popular legislation nationally.

"We are pleased," said Tomas Saenz, counsel for the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund. "It vindicates the important constitutional principal that we cannot be one nation unless we have one immigration policy set by the federal government."

Pfaelzer initially ruled in 1995 that most of the initiative was unconstitutional.

Wilson contended the federal welfare reform act actually empowers states to regulate public benefit issues. He and supporters asked for reconsideration. But in November, she again struck down the heart of the proposition, promising a future ruling on the remaining portions.

"As the court pointed out in its prior opinion, California is powerless to enact its own legislative scheme to regulate immigration," Pfaelzer said in November.

That ruling was partially based on the 1996 Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act, which overhauled welfare benefits and denied them to undocumented immigrants.

"When President Clinton signed the PRA, he effectively ended any further debate about what the states could do in this field," Pfaelzer wrote then.

She believes the U.S. immigration policy is "to deny public benefits to all but a narrowly defined class of immigrants which does not include illegal immigrants."

In 1995 and 1997, she emphasized that the state cannot bar undocumented immigrant children from public schools. That conclusion is based on a 1982 Supreme Court ruling that Wilson wants the high court to reconsider.

ing marijuana I feel healthier. I could actually run a whole block, and sleep at night and eat.

"I was really, really sick. I lost my appetite. I lost my will to live. And a lot of people here have given me the will to live."

A 27-year-old man, who identified himself only as Jaguar, said he was diagnosed with AIDS when he was 15. He sat with his dog, Bear, at the club's front door. Jaguar moved to San Francisco from Florida five years ago and has been homeless ever since.

"Pot's like a major upper for me. It helps me eat. The more pot you smoke, the more open-minded you get ... your mind is going, and it keeps you going."

In West Hollywood, Mayor Steve Martin said President Clinton's stance on marijuana is hypocritical.

"It's really disgusting that President Clinton can get on MTV as a candidate and say, 'I didn't inhale.' That is just sheer hypocrisy. What's such a joke is they are so worried about a few people, many of whom are dying," Martin said.

"We have a lot of people with AIDS and elderly people that are afflicted with glaucoma and cancer. The compassionate use of marijuana has been a very real issue in this community."

Kevin Zeese, president of Common Sense for Drug Policy, lauded the mayors' efforts and said closing the clubs would increase street crime.

"I think the mayors realize that closing these clubs would force 10,000 people into criminality. It would be chaotic," Zeese said.

"If Washington is smart, they'll realize they're in a lose/lose situation. They can lose in the courts or lose in the streets."

Whalen agreed the streets would be safer if the clubs remain open.

"They're not out there looking, they're not out there sneaking, they're not out there doing (anything) illegal," Whalen said of the Cannabis Club's clients. "They're doing medical."

AFRICA

South African government develop career development services. Invitations will be offered to South Africans to come study at UCLA, and administrators on the trip will help train workers there.

In contrast, the student trip will focus more on the development of South African intellectual institutions.

"Currently, 70 percent of South Africa is black and only a small portion of that group can get into college. We want to change those figures," said Darnell Grisby, USAC general representative.

Anika Johnson, another signer of the proposal, claimed that the conditions for a trip to South Africa were perfect.

"It's the right time in South Africa's history and we have motivated people who want to do this. If we do this now we can create a link between our two countries that will improve both societies," Johnson said.

According to organizers, the trip could bring UCLA to the forefront of international politics.

"Chancellor Carnesale has declared he wants to make UCLA a great university – this is a great way to do that. This could develop UCLA internationally," Grisby said.

By developing an international program like this, UCLA could become comparable to universities like Harvard, Grisby continued.

Edmond Keller, considered an expert on African politics and one of the administrators going on the trip next week, agreed.

With free elections coming this May, as well as its human and material capital, South Africa is at a critical juncture, Keller contends.

"UCLA has a great reputation when it comes to international relations, but trips like this and developing relations with South Africa now could improve our reputation greatly," Keller said.

Project South Africa will include the creation of retention programs, a text book drive and assistance in how to start college newspapers.

Future trips to South Africa for the project are planned on a regular basis, though no dates or intervals have been established.

BOSNIA

the morale of our young men and women who served in Bosnia," said Rep. Benjamin Gilman, R-N.Y., chairman of the House International Relations Committee, which earlier this month rejected the same resolution.

In his testimony, Cohen had argued that the War Powers Act should not be tested on a peacekeeping operation.

If Congress did not want the troops to remain in Bosnia, all it had to do was to cut off the funds, the former Republican senator from Maine told the House panel, conceding that he had been skeptical about the intervention "when I sat on the other side of the table."

> "We didn't set a deadline (on a pull-out) just to fool the American people."
> Madeleine Albright
> Secretary of state

Refusing to predict when the mission would end despite an assertion by the chairman, Rep. Floyd Spence, D-S.C., that it was "an open-ended commitment with little chance of success," Cohen said: "Is it going to be a year, two years? No one can tell you at this point. So it's open."

Spence, dissatisfied with Cohen's describing the troops' stay as an uncertainty, told him: "I don't know when we will see the end of it."

He said the United States was taking sides, arming the Bosnian Muslims, for instance, and "doing all the rest of those things that get away form peacekeeping. That's when we get in trouble."

Albright, meanwhile, concentrated on practical reasons for keeping the troops in Bosnia while concurring with Cohen that there was no constitutional obstacle. If the troops were withdrawn, she said, "it would send a message of confusion and uncertain resolve that could slow the peace-building process, discourage our allies from taking a larger share of responsibility and possibly cause extremist leaders to reassert their influence with potentially deadly consequences."

Initially, the Americans in the NATO peacekeeping force were to stay in Bosnia a year, then 18 months, and now Clinton is extending their mission without any deadline.

Defending this zigzag scenario, Albright said: "We set the deadline because we believed it. We didn't set a deadline just to fool the American people. That's the last thing we would do."

But Rep. Stephen E. Buyer, R-Ind., said, "It was almost shameful. No one believed it would be a year."

And Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., complained that the administration had already spent $7 billion for peacekeeping in Bosnia and was now asking for more – $486.9 million for July-September, the last three months of the current fiscal year, and $1.9 billion for fiscal year 1999.

Overall, Congress has generally been supportive – if grudgingly – of the administration's plans to keep U.S. forces in Bosnia beyond the earlier June deadline.

The Senate Appropriations Committee on Tuesday voted 16-2, in fact, for an emergency bill to provide funds for that purpose, as well as for supporting the elevated U.S. presence in the Persian Gulf.

loss of U.S. aid.

Nelson said the Defense Department has provided Mexico with $76 million worth of equipment in the last two years for anti-drug efforts, but he said that includes helicopters that are of little use above 5,000 feet, where most opium poppy is cultivated, and surveillance aircraft that lack the capability to carry out their proposed missions without $3 million in modifications on each plane.

> "You'd think we'd at least provide equipment which is fully operational."
> Dianne Feinstein
> Senator, D.-Calif.

"You'd think we'd at least provide equipment which is fully operational," Feinstein said. "I'm surprised, disappointed and somewhat shocked that the Defense Department didn't take this a little more seriously."

Acting Assistant Secretary of State Rand Beers said the administration is well aware of concerns in Congress about Mexico's drug-fighting record and the certification decision.

"You have to look beyond numbers and look at what is really happening on the ground," Beers said, pointing out Mexico's progress in arresting drug dealers and curtailing corruption.

Certification, he said, "is not meant to drive wedges between us and our foreign colleagues, but to find ways to work with them more effectively."

Donnie Marshall, acting deputy administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, also credited Mexico for attempting to build a reliable civilian law enforcement agency, while adding that law enforcement is only effective when criminals are brougfit to justice. "At present that is not occurring and, as a result, citizens of both the United States and Mexico are suffering greatly."

The law profession is hot again...

Lawyers top the chart of high-paying, fast-growing occupations recently compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The Bureau indicated that between 1994 and the year 2005 there would be 286,000 job openings for lawyers—a 28% increase.
—Newsletter of the Law School Admission Council, March/April 1997

Not since the high-rolling days of the late 1980's have New York's corporate law firms wooed the top law students so assiduously. The ecomony is surging, lawyers are doing very nicely, thank you.
—The New York Times, August 14, 1997

Boom times just keep getting better for the law business. 'We're having another great year in 1997 for mergers and acquisitions, real estate, tax, litigation, product liability, you name it,' exults Robert Sheehan, executive partner at Skadden, Arps, Meagher & Flom.
—The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 1997

So many firms are recruiting talent that competition recently has become downright brutal for top law school graduates and well-regarded mid-level associates ...many of the lawyers recruited have about seven offers on the table.

LOAN

university, said that the loan is for an emergency basis only. Thus, ASUCLA should pay back the loan whenever it has the money.

"The intent was that when cash balances were in place that ASUCLA should be paying back the university," Santon said. "It imposes some discipline on the relationship."

She also said that the emergency line of credit is meant only so that the association can meet payroll and pay its bills.

"It was established for a very specific reason," Santon said.

The emergency line of credit was originally given to ASUCLA in June 1996. It is distinct from the long-term loan which the university lent to the association to help it return to financial stability.

ASUCLA made the transaction because its current bank balance is over $1 million. According to the association's agreement with the university, it must pay back part of the loan if it has a cash reserve of at least $1 million.

ASUCLA will have to borrow that money from the university again during the summer because its balance will probably dip below $1 million.

Eastman said that because the association's business is seasonal and slows considerably during the summer when few people are on campus, the organization's cash resources will almost definitely fall below $1 million this summer.

In addition, ASUCLA asked the university for a distinct mechanism regarding how the association can re-borrow the money it needs. Until recently, ASUCLA management did not know how much notice it needed to give the university, how the money would be delivered to the association and what documentation the university needs to allocate the funds.

"We've had difficulty, the three times we've needed to borrow, having a mechanism to borrow the money," Eastman said.

ASUCLA is now in the process of receiving that mechanism, Eastman said. The association will have to notify the university one to two weeks in advance of its need for the money and will have to provide a bank statement which illustrates its financial situation.

Yanomami.

"When the white man was still far away and there were only Indians here, the Tupan burned down all our forest," he said. "Because of this, we are worried about how we are going to put out the fire and where we will get water."

Vegetation has dried to tinder, and the annual brush-burning by farmers, ranchers and Indians roared over savanna and pastures that cover much of the state. So far, only about one-fifth of the burned area is forest, but residents say the outlook is ominous.

"This is the first time I've seen the fire enter the forest," said Danoli. "If the rain doesn't come next month, the forest is gone."

Roraima Gov. Neudo Campos says the fire has burned more than 1.5 million acres, or about 3 percent of the state. One man has died. In Boa Vista, a city of 150,000, smoke forced the local airport to close for three days.

On Wednesday, federal environmental officials arrived in the city, 2,100 miles northwest of Rio de Janeiro, to meet with Campos and fly over the affected area.

federal aid, two months after Campos declared a state of emergency. Some say the state inflated reports of destruction to obtain more loans.

Gilberto Mendes, a firefighting specialist from Rio de Janeiro, at first thought it would take 1,000 firefighters to combat the blaze. After a closer look, he raised his estimate to 10,000.

Today, the state has just 270 firefighters and few tractors or other equipment. They have built 6,000 small reservoirs and dug wells for water to fight the blaze.

State Civil Defense Chief Kleber Cerquinho said firefighters had been deployed in Apiau, one of the worst-hit regions that borders the Yanomami reservation. But he had to rely on journalists for progress reports – he had no way to communicate with his men in the field.

Loggers, ranchers and farmers already have razed about 12 percent of Brazil's 2-million-square mile rain forest. Some scientists say the destruction adds to global warming.

CLASS

"The department has been criticized in the past for being very rigid and distant from the community. They are starting to move away from this sort of traditional policing towards more community policing," Wilms said.

Community policing refers to the practice of letting the public be more actively involved in protecting their environment. An example are the neighborhood watch programs that exist throughout the city.

After the outrage that resulted from the Rodney King beating, the LAPD saw the need for wide-scale changes.

A Community Police Advisory Board now exists for each of the 18 stations throughout the city. There has also been pressure to move authority down to the captains of each stations, to individualize the policy changes for each specific station.

However, many obstacles still exist before community policing can be fully implemented. There is a struggle going on within the department because community policing has never been defined before.

Also, traditional attitudes of the community towards policemen could present a problem.

Some feel that the bitterness resulting from the Rodney King incident will keep the public from actively cooperating with the LAPD.

Gascon hopes that this class will spark an interest in students who want to know more about public management.

"With this class, we are trying to help people really understand what's going on in the formation of public policy. We'll take a look at the day to day workings of the police department and watch and listen to all the key policy makers," Gascon said.

Wilms stresses that this will not be a textbook course. On two occasions the class will travel to LAPD headquarters and to one of the Department's 18 area stations, where they will be able to see how different policies are carried out. The class will also get a chance to hear from different speakers who are involved with the LAPD such as Chief of Police Bernard Parks.

"It's such an interesting group of people that the students get to spend time with. The LAPD is an agency that's really trying to change with all sorts of influences from inside and out," Wilms said.

BILINGUAL

dren in K-3 need at least two years of English in order to become moderately active participants of an all English-speaking classroom. As the child gets older he or she needs at least three to five years of English instruction.

"It is of great value to teach in both the child's native language and English to allow an acquired transition to occur," Hilger said. "Such guidance, which includes both languages, helps children avoid the trauma of total isolation."

Opponents also point out that the proposition will have tremendous impact on culture issues.

Lina Velasco, the high school outreach coordinator for Movimiento Estudiantil Chicana/o de Aztlán (MEChA) believes that Proposition 227 will give a child the message that his or her native language is no longer necessary.

"The child is forced to forget his/her cultural memory by being denied of the legitimacy of his/her language," added Enrique De La Cruz, assistant director of the Asian American Studies Center.

If passed, Proposition 227 will go into effect 60 days after the vote, which will force 1.4 million students out of fostered bilingual education.

"Such a dramatic change will effect the child's academic performance and may even retard the acquisition of the English language," Hilger said.

The proposal also encourages grouping by English proficiency alone, which means children of all ages will be in one classroom.

"Language acquisition is a developed cognitive process that may vary with different cultures. The older you get the more difficult it becomes to learn new things," De La Cruz said.

"Therefore, one size fits all will not work," he added.

Opponents also believe that one year of sheltered English with many children of varying ages, in one classroom, will greatly impact how these students face their educational career goals in the future.

"If this proposition does pass and goes into affect, it is almost certain that there will be a significant decrease in the percentage of minority students in institutions for higher learning," De La Cruz said.

"It is also likely that there will be an increased number of ESL college students," he added.

Proponents of the bill argue that, under 227, parents are given the option to transfer their children to bilingual classes.

The initiative requires parents to speak to the principal, who would explain both the bilingual program and the program Unz is proposing. After such a meeting the parent would be given a petition to request bilingual education for his or her child.

See BILINGUAL, page 23

However, oftentimes parents can only speak their own native language.

"Voters must realize that these parents cannot comprehend the English language. Hence, transferring children into bilingual education would not be an option for immigrants if the Unz initiative were to pass," De La Cruz said.

Often times the public has misconceptions of what bilingual education does and because of these misunderstandings, some first-generation parents object to their children being in such programs.

"My parents never wanted me in bilingual education because they believed that this program would deprive me of adequate comprehension of both the English and Spanish language – they believed the program was inefficient," said Diana Rivera, a first-year political science student.

"My mother tried to do her best in schooling me, but learning Spanish became difficult and I was made fun of for not being able to speak or write my own language," she added.

However, Unz supporters continue to believe that bilingual education is falling short of its original intentions.

"Bilingual education is not a failure."

Concepción Valadez
Associate professor in education

"Bilingual education was supposed to help our children conquer the business language, but instead it has become a program that shows little faith in our children's intellect," said David Michelstein, former UCLA student and current Proposition 227 campaign volunteer.

"We let them stay in a failing program that only helps them fall behind their peers in English classrooms. The Unz initiative will give our children the lawful and moral right of being taught the English language and in turn they will be given the economic opportunity they deserve," he added.

Unz also argues that the bilingual education program is the cause for poor academic achievement statewide.

"California currently (does) a poor job of educating immigrant children, (and we are) wasting financial resources on costly experimental language programs whose failure over the past two decades is demonstrated by current high drop-out rates," Unz said.

Statistics have shown that only 6 percent of bilingual education students move into English speaking classrooms. It is also proven that the drop out rate for those in bilingual education is more than 35 percent.

However, supporters of bilingual education believe Unz is unjustly attacking bilingual education.

"Bilingual education is not a failure. This program is not the reason for high drop out rates from public schools, as can be seen by the 40 percent of African Americans who drop out and the 18 percent of Caucasians," said Concepción Valadez, an associate professor in education.

"Voters in the June primary should look at the facts before they commit California to the Unz initiative," she added. "This initiative wants to strip our children of their pride, culture and, most importantly, of a good education."

Student fees help others

Thumbs up to a student-designed mandatory fee created to allow more students to be able to afford attending school.

The program at the University of Illinois aims to make college more affordable for those who need financial assistance. Each student is charged $9 per year, while the Illinois Student Assistance Commission matches every dollar collected by the students. The commission then takes the money and awards students demonstrating need for financial assistance. Students have the opportunity every four years to vote whether the program should continue.

While the concept of students helping other needy students is great, the state should be providing all the financial aid to make higher education more affordable and accessible to all. The state should bear the responsibility.

Campus club funding cut

Thumbs down to the Northwestern University Associated Student Government for cutting funding for several campus student groups. The organizations no longer recognized by the student government will not be able to apply for funding which goes toward paying for programs throughout the year. The student government committee made their decision to cut recognition based on groups' membership, financial conduct, quality of programming and how similar they are to other groups.

However, some organizations claimed that their programming was weak as a result of inadequate funding in the first place. The Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Alliance and the Taiwanese American Students Club were among the many organizations cut by the student government's funding priorities. Group members stressed the importance of each of the individual clubs to promote awareness of their specific causes.

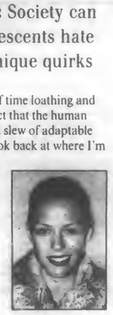
Insecurity obscures mother's talents

QUESTIONS: Society can make adolescents hate parent's unique quirks



Amy Turner

I spend a lot of time loathing and loving the fact that the human race is such a slew of adaptable putty-heads. I look back at where I'm from and what I was taught to value: all of the sparkly-Mercedes driving, Neiman Marcus-shopping, two-story ocean-front home-owning baloney that leaves a community paralyzed in its need for things to define themselves. I remember being blind to all of the conditioned madness. I'm pretty much a putty-head.

When I was 10 I was angry because my mother didn't wear eyeliner or have Estee Lauder pink acrylic nails like the other mothers I saw. I was bitter because she rarely wore anything besides school-teacher dresses with big pockets in the front and because she drove a dumpy car. I was mortified that my mother was not glamorous.

In elementary school I loathed having my mother pick me up in front of the playground. I could never decide whether it was worse to walk home (I had to pass the high school and there were tenacious attacks from the angst-ridden bandos) or get into her dilapidated Capri in front of my peers. When the latter would happen, and it usually did, I would seethe with passionate hate, abnormal for a 10-year-old. It was not like the other parents' cars. There was an inch-and-a-half of Cheerios and other organic litter on the floor. (My younger brother still felt compelled to snack without coordination.) Inside, the marigold stuffing poured out of the vinyl sun-cracked seams; outside it was a muted teal. I hated it because there was only an AM radio that played '50s music, because my mother was totally unfazed and because she would drive around singing out of tune, bonging her thumbs on the shredded steering wheel. I hated the name Capri. It was a wannabe wussy sportscar. I hated it because my mom would laugh, throw us some Cheerios, sing louder and say, "Honey, I'm not going to spend a lot of money on a car you kids eat and slobber and spill in!" My little brother would grin in cahoots with her, with Cheerios stuck to his T-shirt like ornaments on a Christmas tree. It wasn't like my best friend's mom's car, that sleek white Mercedes with the sunroof, the tapedeck and the Bruce Springsteen album ("Greetings from Asbury Park, N.J.") we liked to listen to. Her car smelled like perfume. My mother didn't wear perfume.

I loved to ride in that Mercedes. I loved the leatherette cushion that pulled out in the center and separated my best friend and me into equal spaces.

The back seat of the Capri had an almost complete lack of interior. The majority was springy yellow foam. (Before having children my parents

Don't trade today's joy for tomorrow's stress

HAPPINESS: We could all learn to enjoy a bit more chaos, a bit less structure

Tuesday morning. 6:33 a.m. Static, static ... "amor, amor, amor"... Ahh, my radio had come on, signalling that another day had begun. I stumbled from bed, pawed in the direction of the sound to shut it off, and dragged down the hall to the showers. I was out of T-shirts, my shoes were still wet from the rain, and breakfast ... Man, don't get me started on that nasty orange juice. I managed to lug myself to Spanish class, where I was presented with my most recent quiz, which had earned a C-. Yes, this was going to be one of those days.

Brent Hopkins

Know what the funny thing is? It wasn't. I went outside, with the weight of the impending failure in Spanish and a six-page paper due at 4 p.m. hovering over me. Once I saw the sunlight, though, all that evaporated in a little puff. You know those days after it's just rained – the sky is clear for miles, with no hint of clouds, smog, or anything nasty in the air? Somehow, seeing that sublime blue blanketing the skies, I couldn't worry about my grades, that paper I hadn't finished or the outstanding bill I had on my desk, demanding that I finally pay for those Barry White CDs I ordered way back in November.

This might seem like a pretty trivial thing. A sunny day in Southern California? Big deal. I would argue, however, that it is indeed a big deal. I look all around this gigantic campus and see people wound far too tightly – people who are so caught up in who they're going to be that they forget who they are.

The college years are critically important, no doubt. I realize that the degree you get and the people you meet are going to have an impact on you for the rest of your life. I'm well aware of the fact that classes are important. I also know, though, that all these things shouldn't prevent you from enjoying your life now.

We all want the American dream. Nice house, nice family, nice job, cool car. For some of us, the particulars are a bit different. Maybe your house is a beach-front mansion, maybe it's a teepee. Perhaps your car is a Lincoln, or perhaps it's a '73 Volkswagen Bus with no back window. My point is that we all want to feel like we've led successful lives when we look back at them.

I remember back in high school, right after school had let out for the summer, that I was sitting around, playing Spades with some friends. We were having a lazy, drawn-out conversation about life, and eventually the subject of the future came up. One of those "what do you want to be when you grow up?" deals. People spouted off various things like computer engineer, actor, journalist and whatnot. There was one girl left. I asked her what she wanted to do with her future as she trumped my sure winner with a spade.

"I want to be happy."

That's all she said, and game-play continued as my partner and I were systematically destroyed. At first, I thought that she'd given a really stupid, generic answer, but the more I thought about it, she'd said one of the wisest and most clever things I've ever heard.

She wasn't interested in whether she was a CEO or a taxi driver. She didn't care about where she would live, who she'd marry, what the future held for her or anything stupid like that. The important thing was the feeling she got, not how she got it. That moment, though nearly two years ago, still stands out, crystal clear in my mind.

Echoes and the midnight yell

THE LAST COLUMN: While you still can, engage in camaraderie with fellows

"Goodbye, brothers! You were a good crowd. As good a crowd as ever fisted with wild cries the beating canvas of a heavy foresail; or tossing aloft, invisible in the night, gave back yell for yell to a westerly gale."

–Joseph Conrad

Michael Daugherty

I recall reading about a relatively harmless little ritual practiced by dormitory dwellers during finals week called "Midnight Yell." It takes its name from the fact that it involves yelling and that it happens at midnight.

I suppose the university's position on recreational midnight yelling is not unlike the position that many of us hold on the issue of noise generated by people other than ourselves.

For the record: At this university, yelling is a sanctioned activity. Yell your brains out at a proper sporting event, but don't yell from your dorm room window at midnight during finals week. If you are caught, you'll face the same penalty as those convicted of a first-offense armed robbery: 15 to 30 hours of community service.

It seems the real people who live in Westwood don't like Midnight Yell. I personally don't have a lot of sympathy for anyone who has chosen to live within yelling distance of a humongous university populated by hordes of wild-eyed debauchees and their students. But in fairness, we need to consider both sides of the argument.

On one hand, they have a legitimate gripe. Twelve times a year, during the hours traditionally allocated for beddy-bye and surfing porn sites on the web, the shroud of moneyed silence that envelopes their picturesque enclave (situated smack-dab in the middle of 12 million other people) is rudely pierced by something other than a med-evac helicopter or a spouse's duvet-shredding, chronic flatulence.

On the other hand: screw 'em.

Noise happens. Westwood's Puritan League, in all its wisdom, doesn't have any qualms about putting us through months of ear-melting daytime noise generated by legions of jack-hammerers employed for that oh-so-noble cause of colorizing the crosswalks. But don't yell at midnight, dammit. You might get in trouble.

Don't worry about it. When your RA finally blows the hinges off your door with a couple of 12-gauge slugs, tell her you weren't yelling, that it was ... uh ... your ventriloquist neighbor trying to be funny. Tell her you were practicing primal scream therapy for a psych final. Tell her URSA made you do it.

I'll admit, I haven't done much research on this issue. Perhaps by encouraging you to break a university rule, somebody will get mad at me and make me do community service for conspiring to commit a noise.

Fine, I'll do it. I'll mop every crosswalk in Westwood if that's what they want.

I argue here that the Midnight Yell serves the betterment of humanity: Community service is a good thing; ergo, doing something that very well might lead to community service is a good thing; ergo, participating in Midnight Yell is a good

America needs to think twice about military court system

JUSTICE: Hierarchical structure encourages gender discrimination

By Erica S. Flores and Michele Haydel

The recent verdict acquitting former Sgt. Major Gene McKinney of 18 out of 19 counts of sexual misconduct has severe implications for women in the military and further exemplifies the inequities of the military justice system.

The military jury, composed of six men and two women, rejected the accusations of six military women who accused McKinney of unwanted sexual advances.

Nevertheless, McKinney was convicted on one count of obstruction of justice because of an audio tape documenting his attempt to suppress the testimony of one of his accusers. Obviously, McKinney had something to hide. What prompted him to engage in such a conversation if he was, in fact, innocent?

Contrary to McKinney's defense, it is unlikely that six independent women would come forward with accusations of sexual harassment and subject themselves to the stress of a courtroom trial and the accompanying

U.S. needs monument to mourn African slaves

MEMORIAL: Nation must pay tribute to individuals who sacrificed their lives

By Victor Patton

The "slavery issue" still remains as the festering boil left untreated on the face of what many Americans would consider to be the glory of this nation's past. Even the mere invocation of the word slavery, due to its historical implications, can often make whites defensive of their role in history. And it serves as a reminder to blacks of how they were the unwilling participants in a capitalist endeavor in which they were the actual commodity.

The context in which we as Americans view our history, in light of this "slavery issue" speaks toward the heart and essence of everything that we as Americans are today, and the very substance of who our children will be in the future.

Will we remain a nation of individuals who praise a glorious history of America which has simply never existed? Or a nation of brave individuals unafraid to approach our history with candor and truth, recognizing that the crimson strips of our beloved flag are also permanently stained with the blood of Africans and other people of color as well?

The Associated Press reported last week that while President Clinton will address the issue of slavery during his trip to Africa next month, he will not issue a formal apology to African Americans for slavery.

President Clinton should not apologize for slavery for several reasons,

IRAQ: Attacking motives of rally protesting sanctions serves simply as method to divert students' attention

By Hoda Shawky

Last week, Roee Ruttenberg attacked USAC members Kandea Mosley and Stacey Lee for supporting the March 5 rally put on by a coalition which called for the lifting of sanctions on Iraq ("Rally serves as kickoff for election games," March 12). According to him, they viewed this time as a perfect opportunity for Students First! to find new constituents in order to get reelected in the spring. However, before such rhetoric may be used to divert the attention away from the issue in Iraq, many things need to be made clear.

Sarcastically implying that the time of the rally was no coincidence, Ruttenberg asked why students were suddenly interested in Iraq. If people had been paying attention to the news lately, they would know that there was talk of bombing Iraq after March 23. For that reason, the Muslim Students Association, as well as students from other concerned groups, have been handing out fliers and displaying posters on Bruin Walk to educate people on the situation, as well as planning for a rally in an effort to prevent the bombing. Although the bombing did not occur, the need to end the sanctions still remains an issue more important than the prevention of war. The sanctions are the reason why we decided to hold the rally in the first place – with or without the help of any other group.

Because of U.S. sanctions, more Iraqi children have died than Japanese from the atomic bombs and Bosnians from "ethnic cleansing" combined – and each one of those events was a genocide. Ruttenberg claims that much of our information is incorrect. He is ignorant of the fact that our information came from reports made by U.N. agencies such as UNICEF. While people with compassion for mankind rallied to increase campus awareness on the issue, they were discredited for not having taken enough political science classes on the Middle East to prove that they know something about the topic. Since when do we have to take courses on issues before we can stand up for what is just?

I've never taken a course on African American history, but I know slavery is wrong.

He admits that 4500 Iraqi children die each year in Iraq, further claiming that this number has not increased since the time of the sanctions. To correct his mistake, that is the number of children who die in Iraq each month – now multiply that by 12 months per year! This unfortunate ignorance is why MSA felt the urgency in educating the UCLA campus about Iraq. Perhaps Ruttenberg had a point in arguing that the rally was too one-sided (the other side is presented all day long by the popular media). However, we hope that some awareness was raised about the situation in Iraq. Instead of fuming with rhetoric, perhaps he could have suggested a way in which our efforts would have garnered results. We always welcome honest and productive criticism.

We are all entitled to our own opinions about issues, but no one has the right to question the intentions behind others' choices in supporting a cause. The rally for Iraq was a much-needed spark to awaken Bruins to what the media has failed to adequately cover. Do not try to cover the attempts of students to educate others on Iraq by using the elections of spring quarter to divert attention away from the topic.

The concerned students on campus would like to thank Roee, however, for initiating another avenue by which we can further help to educate our campus on such humanitarian issues.

Shawky is the president of the Muslim Student Association.

Planning to increase diversity with community programs

OUTREACH: New project will give schools direct link to college students

By C. Judson King

The University of California has ambitious plans for enhanced outreach activities. These programs should help make the academic preparation of California's high school graduates more uniform and thereby help us maintain a diverse student body, reflective of the states' population.

In July 1995, when the regents called for no consideration of race, religion, sex, color, ethnicity or national origin in admissions, they chartered a task force to develop proposals for new directions and increased funding for outreach to pre-college students. The regents affirmed that we should strive to have a diverse student body. Diversity is vital because it enriches the academic experience. The UC must be open and accessible to all.

I am pleased that I was able to co-chair the task force on outreach. I was joined by 33 other administrators, students and representatives of the business community, other sectors of education and state agencies. The regents adopted our recommendations in July.

We found that the case of differences in educational motivation and achievement are many and complex. UC should be able to do most about improving and evening out the quality and level of preparation afforded by our schools. Our principal goal is therefore for each of the UCs to create partnerships with the community to help high schools and associated feeder elementary and middle schools. We will pick the partner schools from those that are educationally disadvantaged by any of several measures. Among those, we will pick schools where leaders demonstrate a serious interest in working with us to improve.

In addition, we will evaluate our student-centered development programs such as Mathematics Engineering and Science Achievement and Early Academic Outreach Programs, and will build upon those that accomplish the most, as well as start new programs. We will also increase our supply of information to students, families and schools, as well as recruitment of undergraduate, graduate and professional students. Finally, we want to bring the university's intellectual horsepower to bear on the causes of differences in educational outcomes in our society, and we will structure research along those lines.

We estimate that we need to spend another $60 million per year to carry out the plan. This will about double what we spend on our current outreach programs. We expect to get these funds through a partnership as well – state funds to UC, funds from our K-12 partners, the business community and the federal government.

The job will be challenging, but it is surely a well-paced effort. Many of the university's outreach programs rely on students as tutors, mentors and university representatives. In addition, student creativity and initiative are an important source of developing outreach programs. To spur thinking, we recently have provided each chancellor with $10,000 to support student work in this area. We hope students will join in partnership activities and in other ways to expand outreach.

History often has selective memory

ACHIEVEMENTS: Robeson finally given due notice after one hundred years

By A. Marisol Sulsona and Kelly Vlahakis

Do you know who Paul Robeson is? Did you learn about him in history class? Was his name even mentioned at your school during Black History Month? Do you know that there is an entire class at UCLA about him? Unfortunately, although Robeson deserves as much recognition as Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Malcom X, most Americans have never even heard his name.

Robeson's multifaceted talents have long been maligned, ignored and often denied. He was a scholar, athlete, singer, stage and screen actor, orator, linguist, lawyer and political activist for human civil rights of people all around the world. Yet, although his greatness is unmatched, his legacy has not been preserved. Therefore, on the centennial of his birth, it is crucial to revive the memory of a man who is, arguably, the greatest renaissance person of the 20th century.

Robeson was born on April 9, 1898, in Princeton, N.J. His father was an escaped slave, who taught him to stand up for what he believed, regardless of the price or consequences of his actions. Robeson never backed away from a challenge or his moral convictions.

In an era where racism afforded African Americans few basic rights, Robeson still managed to perform brilliantly in each of his endeavors. In 1915 he won a four-year academic scholarship to Rutgers University and graduated Phi Beta Kappa and valedictorian.

During his years there he lettered in baseball, basketball, track, and was named twice to the All-American football team, the first All-American in Rutgers history. Although he confronted racism at every corner, Robeson excelled at Rutgers and proceeded to attend Columbia Law School. As a lawyer, Robeson's full potential was suppressed by racism. Instead, he turned to theater and music as a means of exercising his talent and full potential.

He became the first African American to play Othello. His stunning performance became the longest running Shakespearean play in Broadway history. Along with appearing in theatrical productions he also starred in such films as, Sanders of the River, King Solomon's Mines, Proud Valley, Body and Soul, The Emperor Jones, Jericho, Tales of Manhattan, and several others. Through his music, he promoted empowerment through black spirituals and sang in numerous languages throughout the United States, Africa, Europe and the Soviet Union to encourage peace and social justice. With these talents, he began his journey to restore dignity to his people. Unfortunately, his human and civil rights activities placed him under intense scrutiny by the House on Un-American Activities Committee during the McCarthy era and the Cold War. It labeled him as a communist, revoked his passport, and subotaged his entire career. As a victim of the political hysteria of the times, his outstanding lifetime accomplishments were tragically erased from our historical records. His legacy is not widely taught in our school nor is his name known by the majority of our population. Instead of being remembered as the hero that he was, our historical amnesia has allowed him to fade away.

A remedy for this atrocious censorship is finally beginning to surface. This year, the centennial of his birth, a concerted effort is being made throughout the nation to pay tribute to this quintessential genius. On Feb. 25, he was awarded a Lifetime Achievement Award during the Grammy proceedings.

Furthermore, committees all over the country are putting on events in his honor. Currently, there is an exhibit at the Hollywood Entertainment Museum as well as at the Kerckhoff Art Gallery at UCLA.

Also, on April 9, a birthday celebration for Robeson will take place at the Museum of Tolerance from 7-10 p.m. For more information on upcoming events, you can contact the Paul Robeson Community Center and Centennial Committee of Southern California at (213) 752-PAUL (7285) or visit one of the many web sites. Paul Robeson is only one of many people who our sanitized version of history chooses to ignore. It is our responsibility to empower ourselves through learning more about these important people.

Sulsona is a senior double majoring in history and political science. Vlahakis is a third-year communication studies and history student.

PATTON

but mainly because even if such an apology was given, it would not alleviate the racial attitudes which permeate every aspect of American society.

The vast majority of whites will continue to ignore the fact that they are the direct benefactors of slavery and oppression. Meanwhile the vast majority of blacks will remain frustrated with whites for their continuing complicity through ignorance.

However, this does not mean that progressive individuals from both races cannot find a viable solution to change black and white perceptions of one another, which for the most part have remained in diametric opposition.

Part of the solution, at least in the short run, is for Americans to collectively establish a National Black Holocaust Monument.

Several historians have estimated that over 60 million Africans suffered and died during the Trans-Atlantic slave trade, in addition to the ones that would experience unimaginable horrors visited upon them by colonial oppressors after their arrival in New World.

Mourning for Americans, by Americans, and the establishment of a National Black Holocaust Monument would serve a dual purpose.

First of all, it would allow African Americans to come together, and attempt to lay to rest the souls of their ancestors whose voices can still be heard from the grave, and secondly it would compel all progressive people of the world to finally acknowledge that this unimaginable horror took place.

Not once in its over 200 years of existence has the United States ever established a place where people from all over the nation can mourn for Africans who most unwillingly spilled their blood, so that the experiment of America could come to fruition.

Acknowledging the blood-stained past and wrongs of our country does nothing to take away from historical greatness of America, but can only serve to improve America for future generations, and prove to the entire world that the United States is indeed striving to become the multi-cultural democracy which has been left unrealized.

With these things taken into consideration, I hereby challenge President Clinton to not merely make an apology to African Americans for the historical event of slavery, but to go a major step further, and allocate funds to build a National Black Holocaust Monument which will serve not only to recognize and pay tribute to the Africans who suffered and died through slavery yesterday, but also to educate and enlighten the people of the world today of this travesty which we must never ever allow to happen again.

President Clinton's words of an apology would only be worth the breath it takes to muster them from his lips. But a Black Holocaust Monument comparable to the other great monuments of this country and the world, would stand the test of time, and remind generations of Americans of the sacrifices of our African forefathers and foremothers, who were brought to this country in bondage.

As Martin Luther King Jr. said so eloquently, "We must learn to live together as brothers or perish together as fools." The time is now.

HOPKINS

I've always had my particular little ideas about what I'd like to do what my life, but now I see that if they don't work out exactly as I'd planned, that it isn't the end of the world. I'm not saying that I want to end up as a skid-row drunk, trying to scrounge up quarters to buy another bottle of Wild Turkey, but rather that the road to happiness doesn't necessarily have to be set and defined by the age of 18.

There's nothing wrong with having goals. I think it's a good idea to have a plan for what you want to do. When that plan consumes you, and you forget how to enjoy life, there's a problem. You know the people who do this, the ones with those gigantic bags under their eyes in the middle of the week, whose hands twitch when they don't have a pen in their hands and who freak out if they get "only" an A- on a quiz worth 2 percent of their grade. These people are slowly killing themselves for the sake of the future.

I don't think that the solution is to say, "Forget this med-school junk, I'm going to go sleep on the beach and eat at McDonald's forever." I think that the solution is to learn to balance the enjoyment that the future will hopefully render with the pleasures of today. Where does that spring from?

I think that the answer does not lie in the graduate school you might attend or the job you might get. Learning to enjoy the simple pleasures in life is a cheap, easy way to have a good time. Some of you are probably saying, "That's it? I could have figured that out on my own, genius!" Those of you who have already dawned on that, good job, you're wiser than you might think. A lot of people can't seem to appreciate things like that, though.

I don't mean this to seem like some corny "you've gotta accentuate the positive" inspirational message. I did think of an analogy for this, however. Bear with me. I'm an English major – getting to the point is something alien to me. Most of us like music, so imagine your life being like a concert. Some people want their life to be a classical recital, with 47 violinists, the finest horn players in the world and enough woodwinds to fill Carnegie Hall. They're playing the music of the greats, exactly like Bach, Beethoven and all those other cats wanted it done. Now that's cool, don't get me wrong. If you have full company like that, all playing in unison perfectly, you can make some beautiful music.

In this little life analogy, the antithesis of that symphony would probably be a rock band. Three musicians, playing songs with four chords, singing about how their baby did them wrong. Once in a while, they'll completely leave the format and improvise, ignoring what the songwriter intended. This is basic, straightforward stuff, uncomplicated and simple. Lots of people would sneer at this kind of music as being uncreative and formulaic.

There's nothing wrong with a symphony, but it's a lot easier to get pleasing music out of a rock band. For a symphony to work well, all the players need to interact perfectly, hitting each note with exact timing. And they need flawless memory for what they're going to play next. If one screws up, then everything falls apart because their mistake distracts the others, catches the audience's attention, and then the song is a wreck. They had the potential for greatness but a simple little mistake threw a wrench in all the plans.

In a rock band, it's just a couple of people goofing around, doing things that are catchy and easy to remember. When they go off on their improvisations, they're taking the song and making it their own in a way. It might not be exactly what the song was originally like, but it makes it different and interesting. They might make a mistake here and there, but the song isn't too complex, so they can recover.

If you let your life be a rock band, you'll be happier, I guarantee it. You will find your happiness in simplicity and you can enjoy life for what it is. By using those little improvisations, you can get out of the rules and formulas that hold you back from happiness. Next time when it's a nice day, go for a walk, read a good book, grab a bite to eat with your friends. Don't cash it in and flunk out, but take some time to enjoy the simple stuff.

Wow, a whole column on enjoying simplicity. It might be uncultured, it might be unrefined, but I don't particularly care. For those of you who want to listen to the symphony, go for it. If it doesn't work out, though don't forget rock music, greasy hamburgers and a smog-free L.A. day out there too.

media scrutiny. In the end, the motives of these women were questioned more than the actions of their accuser, and the testimony of one man was accepted over that of six women.

According to military statistics, one out of five women in the military experiences sexual harassment. This verdict discourages these women from coming forward with their claims and suggests that women have little opportunity for redress in the military. At a time when the military claims to have a sincere desire to address issues of sexual harassment in their institutions, McKinney's acquittal will have a tragically chilling effect.

As long as military officials continue to be tried in military courts, justice will be elusive. It is problematic to have members of the armed forces serving as jurors and judges because they inherently have an interest in protecting the military's image. Even more worrisome is the fact that McKinney was heading a committee on sexual harassment to address the military's recent problem with sexual misconduct at the time when the reported allegations took place.

In order to understand the root cause of all of these controversies, military culture itself must be questioned. A hierarchical structure is the primary mode of organization in the armed forces. In spite of tremendous advances by women in society, gender relations are still unequal because men hold more power than women. When this scenario is translated to military institutions where power differentials are clearly defined, women are bound to be at a disadvantage. Women face a double burden because they generally hold lower-ranked positions and also suffer from lower status based on their gender. In this way, regardless of military ranking, women face obstacles.

This is not to say that women should be excluded from military service. Rather, military culture must change to reflect women's growing equality in society.

Military officials justify a system of hierarchy because a chain of command establishes order in preparation for combat. This chain of command not only requires soldiers to obey their superiors, but also forsake personal safety to engage in violent encounters during war.

Violence may be justified during time of war, but a culture of violence also permeates throughout military institutions even during times of peace. The military mentality required for combat is difficult to disengage and often leads to violence against women, people of color, and gays and lesbians serving in the military.

Sexual harassment is an expression of violence against women. Acquitting McKinney on 18 counts of sexual misconduct demonstrates just how pervasive the military culture of power and violence is. The allegations of six women were invalidated, sending a message that sexual harassment is tolerated in the military. Until the military and the American public rethink military culture, this type of behavior aimed toward women and other under-represented groups is likely to continue, and military justice will be far from just.

DAUGHERTY

thing. In other words, by yelling (assuming you get caught) you're actually helping the community. Bully for you. Yell for the good of our UCLA community.

Yell your brains out. Come every midnight of finals week, turn the lights out, open the window, and scream till your uvula shatters. Yell now, while you still can. Because once it's over, it's over. You won't be yelling again for a long time, at least not until you have college-aged kids of your own.

I don't live within yelling distance of UCLA, so why should I care? I'll tell you why. Because today at noon, give or take a few minutes, I'll sit down for the final lecture of my undergraduate college career. For one hour and 40 minutes I'll sit there and think: "This can't be it. This can't be. I still don't know enough." And then I'll walk out of there and I'll go to my car and drive away and nothing will ever be the same again. The next time I feel like engaging in a little communal yelling with my neighbors, it won't be done in the spirit of camaraderie; it'll be about parking spaces or trash cans or something else equally insipid and depressing. Yell while the yelling's good.

And if you're at a loss for what to yell at midnight, I can't really help you. Well, maybe I can. Perhaps a page or two from "Little Gidding." (Eliot has a few germane reflections on the "hidden" voice.) But, "Four Quartets" is not your only choice; I'd be impressed as hell to hear you quote from Blake, who probably hollered as he wrote.

But I will tell you what I'd do if I were there with you, at midnight, in your room. I'd yell thanks for heaven's seeing fit my way through school. I'd yell a solemn oath to my own soul that I wouldn't ever let it all have been for nothing. And when my human version of a syrinx was toasty-warm with those, I'd let go my deepest and most holy gratitude, a padeuteria, for the professors at Rolfe Hall and elsewhere who have had such an immeasurable influence on my education, and by extension, my mind, and by extension, my very life. I'd yell out their names, one by one, and listen, then, assured, for the echo that would come back to me from nearby structures invisible in the night. And I will always listen, forever assured, for that same echo coming back to me in the far-away days and years that lay, nay – lie, ahead.

To them, and to you, dear reader, and to my friends, class-mates, and fellow Daily Bruin riffraff, I say: thank you and good-bye.

had Boxers.) I would remain enflamed in the back, watching my brother and his floppy red lips sing along to the totally uncool '50s station. The nincompoop didn't even know the words. His vocal stylings consisted of elongating the vowels. Like a family dog, he loved getting to ride in cars. The excitement took over and for some reason his legs would stick straight out, sort of paralyzed in front of him, so all I saw was his bobbing blond head and his catatonic blue-and-yellow Zipps tennis shoes.

> I embraced magazine ... style and mocked my mother's skills.

I spent a lot of my youth in this dismal state – a tacit repulsion from everything related to my mom because there was no way my mom was cool. Just a couple of squinting eyes and crossed arms over my chest – that was me. As years went by, I found other things to hate. I embraced magazine-dispensed style and mocked my mother's skills. She was a home-economics teacher. – I made it my duty to negate activities like sewing, cooking, '50s music, (insert anything she liked or was good at).

It's 1998 and the Capri was traded in ages ago. I can't sew a button but I make a decent stir-fry and take pleasure in Otis Redding. It's just part of the cycle, I guess. I let my environment dictate a lot. I don't know why I wasn't more like my brother, all slobber and grins, but I know now what a powerful woman my mom is. I've watched her sew me new pants, grow 12 varieties of roses and prop over a pineapple upside-down cake that would make Julia Child whimper. I've seen her paint a house, and my father has shown me a turquoise ring she made for him when he came home from Vietnam.

> How come after adding fractions we didn't have Elementary Emerson?

All those skills that I made such an effort to cover up have become valuable to me. They make up her texture. They are her edges that don't often show at first glance. They are not well coifed or dusted with Estee Lauder pink blush. I've realized that when I was a little girl I wanted a hybrid of Kathie Lee Gifford and Cheryl Tiegs for a mother. I wanted to watch someone wake up and "put on her face." I guess I learned this from my friends, or television or something. I guess that's what irks me.

As a kid, how did I morph into such a shallow, judgmental brat? Is there a remedy for insecurity? Did it happen to everyone? How come after adding fractions we didn't have Elementary Emerson? ("Alright boys and girls, repeat after me, 'Insist on yourself; never imitate' and for extra credit, who can tell me what 'heed thy private dream; thou wilt not be missed in the scorning and the skepticism' means?") I went home last weekend, drove around a lot, thought about the flying Cheerios and my brother's Zipps. I was thankful that my mother had texture – and for the first time, I really missed that Capri.

Ailey through the ages

Judith Jamison secures the Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater's place in history

Judith Jamison, previously an Ailey dancer and choreographer, is now the company's artistic director.

By Cheryl Klein
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

A few scraps of metal – perhaps the remnants of a broken pen cartridge – lie on the table of the Daily Bruin's otherwise bare conference room. They wait there for a custodian's encompassing sweep.

But instead they get Judith Jamison, artistic director of the Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater and sharp-eyed scout for all things bearing creative potential. Immediately, she begins arranging the gold-hued twigs into patterns, her slender dancer's hands saying as much as her bright eyes and mile-a-minute speech.

"It looks like pieces of metal, doesn't it? Look at that!" Jamison marvels. "What does he call it? The something theory. In 'Jurassic Park,' Jeff Goldblum ... The chaos theory!"

It's hard to say just how well the turtle-necked mathematician's musings apply to the artistic world. On one hand, it takes a lot of luck to keep a dance company afloat for 40 years. Perhaps even a little chaos, if one traces the Ailey Company's sporadic if determined beginnings, performing off and on in various New York City YMCA's.

But the modern dance troupe also boasts a firm commitment to populist dance and relentless curiosity. As the 30-some dancers travel the world, stopping at the Dorothy Chandler Pavilion for four performances beginning Thursday, little escapes Jamison's grasp. She inquires about silly snapshots on Bruin employees' desks, and when the company made an unprecedented visit to South Africa, she made sure her dancers worked a few Zulu dance lessons into their busy tour schedules.

"Because," Jamison says, "dancers are always voracious about new things, about perfecting what is old and grasping at what is new and trying to put it on yourself, rub it into the skin."

Appropriately, the company's 40th anniversary celebration is a sampling of just what Ailey and his legacy have perfected over the years. The six pieces Jamison chose represent the company's eclectic tastes and continual nod to cultural history.

Half the works are Ailey's own creations: 1971's "Cry," 1974's "Night Creature" and, of course, "Revelations," the signature 1960 ballet of African American musical discovery that revealed the company as a powerful voice in contemporary dance. Decades later, a third generation of dancers is making the moves their own.

"There's this constant turnover about relating it in your mind to your life," Jamison says of the choreography.

Electronica bands rock Palladium crowd

MUSIC: Five groups combine talents for a concert loaded with good, bad performances

By Trinh Bui
Daily Bruin Contributor

Techno, house, electronica ... call it whatever the people (or the media) deem appropriate, but one thing proved painfully clear at the Palladium's Friday night mini-dance festival: People for the most part still can't figure it out.

For the past two years, record companies have signed, mega-marketed and dumped a hundred new "electronic" albums on consumers. To date, only Daft Punk, Chemical Brothers and Prodigy have certified gold record sales. If grunge was the gifted, successful child of the recording industry, electronica is the underachieving bastard son who on occasion stumbles upon moments of brilliance.

The Palladium engagement brought together five breakthrough artists of electronica for one five-hour party. The quintet bill of BT, David Holmes, Propellerheads, Fatboy Slim and Crystal Method featured super-talented musicians with the potential to carry such a long show but not all got their proper respect as attendees failed to catch on to electronic etiquette.

Dance music's effect on the mainstream audience was evident when looking at the Palladium's mostly straight-laced crowd. Audience members in denim shirts, blue jeans and hockey jerseys came just to see the latest craze. This Toad the Wet Sprocket crowd mixed with the more up-on-the-scene wannabes juxtaposed the tight cult-like following that started the hype and grabbed the attention of music industry experts seeking to profit from rave music.

Brian Transeau's (BT) set saw a sparsely-filled dance floor appreciating his efforts. People nodded heads attentively rather than gyrating about during BT's hour-long, melody mix-matching performance. The Maryland native spun tunes off his previous "Ima" album as hardcore afficionados lingered in satellite groups around the sides of the Palladium, dancing away to BT's beats, which had landed him a collaboration gig with Tori Amos with the hit single, "Blue Skies." In the end, BT did his best to prep the sell-out audience for the rest of the night.

Unfortunately, any progress made by BT died during David Holmes' disastrous session on the turntables. Electronic DJ's are often knocked for being a class of faceless, soul-less entertainers, and that point hit home during Holmes' set.

Holmes opted to perform in the back of the room hidden behind consoles and sampling machines. Either the audience didn't care or just didn't know that Holmes was performing. Virtually no one danced; they either left the dance floor for the bathroom, to drink or reload on speed.

Ignoring Holmes' big beat extravaganza, the remainder of the audience gazed tentatively at the sound technicians readying the stage for the Propellerheads. Not even a resurrected Jesus Christ spinning New Testament break-beats could have livened up the joint. A sad sight indeed. Holmes' set raises the ever-present question: Can electronic artists flourish in a

Never say never

Neve Campbell, perennial good girl, turns bad in 'Wild Things'

Mandalay Entertainment

Denise Richards (left) and Neve Campbell star in "Wild Things," a tale of revenge, sex and murder.

By Stephanie Sheh
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

Only in Hollywood can someone be punished for doing something too well. Sometimes referred to as typecasting or pigeon-holing, actors dread being tied to playing one character.

But Neve Campbell is breaking the chains that bind by deviating from the good girl roles that she's known for in the new film "Wild Things," which opens Friday. Complete with burgundy hair, dark make-up and tattoos, Campbell plays Suzie Toller, a bitter, socially rejected high school student who's out to cause a little trouble.

Looking like her more wholesome characters in a black skirt and sleek tank top, Campbell sits down in a large conference room at the Century Plaza Hotel to talk about her career and new film.

"The very reason I took this movie is because I got to play the bad girl," Campbell explains. "Because I wanted to challenge myself in that way and learn what it is to play someone evil. For the same reason, I don't want to be typecast as a television actress. I don't want to be typecast as just one kind of character, just a good girl."

Co-star Denise Richards, who was last seen in "Starship Troopers," had no problem believing Campbell in this new kind of role.

"I think she did an amazing job," Richards says emphatically. "We really hit it off before we started shooting. I think she was very convincing when we were in our scenes and when they said 'cut' we would laugh."

The acting challenge also proved to be rewarding for Campbell. When asked if playing bad roles are more fun, Campbell bursts into her distinct uninhibited laugh.

"Yeah it is. It's a lot of fun," Campbell continues in the midst of laughter. "It's always more fascinating to me to play characters who are really messed up because I'm not really close to those kinds of people in my life. And it's fascinating to try and understand why people choose to go in an evil direction in their lives."

Since the actress could not draw from her personal life when portraying Suzie, Campbell researched the role by visiting prisons when she reached Miami, where the film was shot.

"I met a young woman and we were supposed to talk about half an hour but we ended up talking for about four hours because we really hit it off," Campbell recalls. "She expressed to me why she made certain decisions in her life and why her life had gone in such a bad way and what the experience was to be in jail."

The inmate also explained why she was so guarded and defensive which Campbell says helped her in playing the character. It was also refreshing for Campbell that the woman had never watched the television show "Party of Five" and did not know who Campbell was.

More often than not though, the actress is recognized as Julia from "Party of Five," the young Salinger who is now married and struggling to handle the new responsibilities of an independent life. Over the years Julia has become a role model to young women and recently Campbell was awarded a "Best Family TV Actress" award from the Family Films and Family Television Academy. With all of this surrounding her, Campbell has no qualms about how the public will respond to her playing the less than angelic character of Suzie.

"I don't choose to be a role model. I don't think it's my responsibility to concern myself with what the audiences are going to accept and not accept," Campbell explains. "I want to have some kind of longevity to my career. I would like to look back on my career when I am 50 years old and say that I have a huge library of characters. I also don't want to be bored playing the same kinds of characters because if I become bored I think that audiences will be too."

Although Campbell has been playing Julia for four years now, the 24-year-old actress has kept herself occupied by making films like "The Craft" and the "Scream" movies on her hiatuses.

"I just don't sleep," Campbell laughs. "It's tough. I really am not sleeping a whole lot lately. My crew jokes about it like. 'Neve, you're just doing "Party of Five" these days? You must be getting a lot of sleep.'"

But Campbell has learned to deal with the lack of sleep, "I'm at a point where although I'm tired, I know that it's necessary for me to continue to do films on my hiatuses because come two years when 'Party of Five' is done I want to still have my face out there in film so that I can still have a career after it."

The television show has actually been renewed for three years, but Campbell's contract is up in only two. And the actress says that she has let people know that she does not plan on remaining there for more than another two years. Similarly, Campbell's need to play different characters has kept her from saying yes to the third "Scream" sequel. But making "Scream 3" is not completely out of the question.

"They'd really like me to say, 'Yes I'll do it now.' Because they need to write the script," Campbell says. "But I don't want to be typecast as Sidney or Julia and I only get the opportunity to do one movie on my hiatus. If I find another really fantastic script, and it's a choice between 'Scream 3' and this other script, I'll do the other script.

"I could make a 'Scream 3' and everyone will see me and it'll be successful, but people might think that's all I can do again and I won't have a career after that," Campbell continues. "Then what do I want to choose? Do I want to choose a lot of money or do I want to choose longevity?"

In addition to playing more diverse characters, Campbell has voiced interest in playing characters closer to her age. Thus far, she has generally been cast as high school and college students. But that's soon to change.

Campbell is actually playing her own age in an upcoming film titled "54."

"And I'm actually going to do a romantic comedy for Warner Brothers called 'Three to Tango' and I'll be 25 so I play older than me," laughs Campbell, proving that she's up to resisting the molds of the industry.

FILM: "Wild Things" opens Friday.

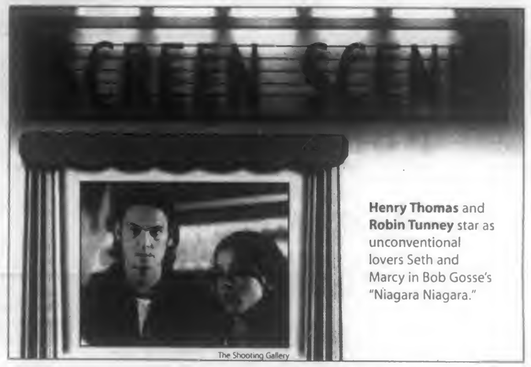
"Niagara Niagara"
Directed by Bob Gosse
Starring Henry Thomas and Robin Tunney

If ever there was a more depressing movie, the audience would just commit a mass suicide. Luckily, "Niagara Niagara" does not quite cross that line, and the result is a beautifully moving yet disturbing love story.

It's the tale of a troubled young couple's unusual road trip, as they travel to Canada in search of a rare doll. Seth (Thomas), an emotionally-starved loner who spends his free time shoplifting, meets Marcy (Tunney) in a department store where they collide in a pile of stolen merchandise that they both had taken. She expresses her strange desire for an African American version of a popular make-up doll. After a second chance meeting, Marcy impulsively suggests that they hit the road to find the object of her obsession. Eventually it's obvious that Marcy is an unusual young woman who suffers from Tourette's Syndrome, an obsessive-compulsive disorder that produces vocal and physical tics and outbursts.

Throughout the movie, the two must deal with Marcy's deteriorating condition after pharmacies deny her feeble requests for medication; the problems they encounter with people who do not understand her strange behavior; and their growing love for one another.

There are no particularly lovable characters in "Niagara Niagara," although the premise initially suggests that the audience should cheer for Marcy. But that's until her violent outbursts cause the audience to develop an ambivalent feeling toward her. The audience soon develops an ambivalent feeling toward each of the miserable characters, and ultimately the story seems better watched objectively.



The Shooting Gallery

Henry Thomas and Robin Tunney star as unconventional lovers Seth and Marcy in Bob Gosse's "Niagara Niagara."

Tunney gives an outstanding performance in a physically and emotionally demanding role. While playing such a volatile character could easily lead to overacting, Tunney balances the range of emotions well and allows the audience to truly understand, and sometimes empathize with, Marcy. Playing with much subtlety and strength, Thomas is also noteworthy as the more grounded and practical of the two, although his performance in the beginning of the movie is a little weak, delivering his lines in a somewhat unnatural manner that luckily disappears once the film gets going.

The opening scenes of the film are generally the weakest, not only because of Thomas' dull performance, but also because of an unrealistic plot, in which Marcy and Seth meet under somewhat forced circumstances. Their friendship seems to be established so quickly that the audience wonders if they had already known each other beforehand.

Later in the movie, the couple also goes on a continuous alcohol and prescription drug binge to which they feel no apparent negative effects. It is hard to believe that this lethal combination taken in such large doses would not at least render them slightly lethargic.

However, "Niagara Niagara's" dramatic climax and resolution more than make up for its earlier inadequacies. The intoxicating blend of music and striking cinematography and interesting dialogue draws the audience into their sad world and provides for an emotionally intense, if draining, experience.

"Wide Awake"
Directed by M. Night Shyamalan
Starring Joseph Cross, Robert Loggia and Rosie O'Donnell

This movie is about kids. This movie is about God. This movie is about single-sex prep schools. But believe it or not, this movie is about everybody.

While "Wide Awake's" premise may appeal to a limited audience, its story is universal. Ten-year-old Cross stars as Joshua A. Beal, a prep school kid on his first day of the fifth grade, several months after the death of his beloved

Composer enters spotlight with debut album, concert

MUSIC: Stephen Schwartz avoids critics as he extends his resume beyond feature film soundtracks

By Laura Noguera
Daily Bruin Contributor

Do nothing, say nothing – be nothing. That's what the motivational sign hanging on a songwriter's door reads. Those are the three simple steps for avoiding criticism.

But this songwriter has done and said something. He is Stephen Schwartz, composer, songwriter and singer. Schwartz has written songs since the age of seven, but just last year released his first album and has yet to perform in Los Angeles. On March 27, Schwartz is making his only Los Angeles appearance at UCLA's Schoenberg Hall. Despite the sign on his door, Schwartz is doing everything.

> "People seem to like (my songs) and be amazed that I can actually sing."
> Stephen Schwartz
> Singer/songwriter

"You never know where a door is going to open and why," Schwartz says. "So you should just walk through all of them."

Having written songs and music compositions, including the score for "Godspell," Schwartz's next step was to release an album. Last year the composer-turned-recording-artist created an album in a style reflective of his musical theater background.

"It's contemporary pop with a slight theatrical flavor," says Michael Kerker, director of musical theater at the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers.

Songs from Schwartz's album, "Reluctant Pilgrim," comprise the majority of the UCLA concert. The unfamiliar material makes Schwartz anxious about audience reactions.

"It takes more energy from an audience to listen to new songs than to sit and listen to songs they already know," Schwartz says.

With only jingles and back up vocals as his singing credits, "Reluctant Pilgrim" is Schwartz's first solo act attempt. Now a band backs up his vocals in live performances, as he stands in the spotlight delivering his original songs.

"People seem to like (my songs) and be amazed that I can actually sing," Schwartz says.

However, some critics recommend that Schwartz limit himself to his music compositions instead of singing. Like a veteran, Schwartz overcomes criticism using a simple policy – he does not read reviews.

"I found dealing with critics, whether they were saying positive or negative things, very difficult and quite destructive to me," Schwartz says. "So I just stopped reading them."

Following the "Pocahontas" opening, Schwartz received exceptional reviews for his collaboration with Alan Menken on the film's soundtrack.

Friends urged him to read the reviews, but Schwartz says, "I completely refused. I just said, 'No, I don't read reviews. If I read the good ones, then I have to read the bad ones.'"

UCLA Center for the Performing Arts

Academy Award-winner Stephen Schwartz doesn't read his reviews.

The "Pocahontas" soundtrack handed Schwartz critic appraisal, and the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences handed him his second Oscar. The film's success established Schwartz's animated feature career, and led to work on other films like "Hunchback of Notre Dame" and DreamWorks' first animated feature, "Prince of Egypt."

"It never occurred to me, even in my fantasies of being a theater writer and writing all these musicals, that what I would wind up doing would be working in Hollywood and doing animated features."

Schwartz is offered these features because Hollywood knows of his experience and knowledge, working with giants like Leonard Bernstein, nearly mastering his songwriting techniques that get him inside characters.

"You're thinking about what the character is feeling or wants and try to have a sense of how the character expresses him or herself," Schwartz says. "Then that just comes out as words and has to be shaped into lyrics."

While his animated feature soundtracks express those characters' mentalities, the Schwartz mentality expressed on his album and in performance intrigues audiences.

"His lyrics are sensitive," Kerker says. "They are heartfelt and filled with emotion."

The pressure to write the perfect lyrics has caused Schwartz one memorable case of songwriter's block. Schwartz's constrainment ended after a fellow songwriter advised him to stop trying to be the editor.

"I realized that he was right," Schwartz says. "You have to stop being the editor and be the writer and stop worrying about whether things are good or not."

That episode was the last block Schwartz admits to having. The next time he finds himself struggling with a block or critics, he should look to the sign on his door for encouragement.

"I'll take a look at that," Schwartz says, "and realize that the alternative to not getting criticized is not to do anything at all."

MUSIC: Stephen Schwartz will perform his show "Reluctant Pilgrim" at UCLA's Schoenberg Hall March 27 at 8 p.m. For tickets and more information, call (310) 825-2101.

Russia has AIDS, drugs and issues, too

ART: Similarity to U.S. seen in public service announcement posters

By Michael Gillette
Daily Bruin Contributor

The Russian propaganda on display at the Kerckhoff Art Gallery is relatively free of the America-baiting, pro-communist messages students may remember from their youths.

Instead, the exhibit gathers a collection of post-glasnost public service announcements, whose subjects will likely strike viewers as very familiar.

> "The issues relevant in Russia are relevant in the U.S."
> Susan Kresin
> Professor

The bulk of the posters feature warnings about AIDS, pleas against drug use and messages about the environment.

This universality in fact was the impetus behind the organization.

"We wanted to show that the issues relevant in Russia are relevant in the U.S.," says Professor Susan Kresin, one of the show's organizers. "This is the first time that these issues were talked about in Russia, and that makes the show unique."

The posters on display were made available for this exhibit by Tom Ferris of the California Institute of Russian Studies. Ferris worked with UCLA's Slavic department that arranged the event, and was also responsible for last year's exhibition of contemporary St. Petersburg artists at the same venue.

The show chronicles a unique moment in Russian society when political art and public discussion centered on these once-taboo issues. That moment has since passed, according to Kresin.

"Once Gorbachev fell from power, this kind of political art stopped," Kresin says.

This kind of political propaganda art holds an important place in Russian culture, says UCLA Slavic instructor Nelya Dubrovich. "It's in the Russian tradition from before the revolution, through the revolution and even until now," Dubrovich says.

Before glasnost the issues dealt with in posters were different, Dubrovich explains. Society addressed drug and alcohol issues, but focused mainly on more mundane subjects like worker efficiency and pedestrian safety. Political discussion was limited to the realm of party loyalty and, yes, anti-Americanism.

"There were many posters with Uncle Sam as a monster gobbling up Europe with blood dripping off of him," Dubrovich says.

Dubrovich believes the art in the posters at Kerckhoff is more interesting than the placards from the Soviet era. She attributes this to the liberation that the artists likely felt when their concerns matched those of the government.

The posters chosen by the exhibit's

Festival celebrates outbreak of daring films in the 1970s

CINEMA: Santa Barbara leaves the surfboards behind to go for the glitz

By Lonnie Harris
Daily Bruin Contributor

Though it is located a scant 100 miles north of the geographic center of the film industry, the city of Santa Barbara is not often associated with the glitz and glamour of Hollywood. Whereas Tinseltown is commonly thought of as the point around which celebrities and gala premieres orbit, Santa Barbara is mainly content with its reputation as a quiet beachside resort, where surfing is a more likely pastime than composing a screenplay.

But for the past two weekends, all of this changed, when the city of Santa Barbara hosted its 13th Annual International Film Festival. Bringing in new films from over 20 different countries, the festival is quickly becoming one of the nation's largest and most prestigious showcases for independent and foreign films.

As with any event in the film world, the Santa Barbara Film Festival was overrun with celebrity appearances during its two week tenure in the city's small but pleasant downtown area. Anyone walking down Cabrillo or Carrallo Street was likely to spot at least one recognizable face, from Sinbad to Pierce Brosnan. Many were there to speak about their latest projects, and some were there just for the chance to soak up some sun and see a few new movies.

The theme of this year's festival was "The Magnificent 70s." According to the festival's artistic director Renée Missel, this theme was "inspired by film critic Charles Champlin and his book 'Hollywood's Revolutionary Decade: Charles Champlin reviews the films of the '70s.'"

Champlin himself made many appearances during the 10 days, and took these opportunities to discuss the importance of this decade to the history of filmmaking. According to Champlin, the 1970s was the most radical and experimental decade in American Cinema, mainly due to the abolition of the restrictive Hays Code for film censorship in 1968. Once movies could include more adult material, including sexual references, drug-abuse themes and even homoeroticism, a new generation of daring filmmakers stepped into the spotlight and produced vibrant, original works.

One of these filmmakers was John Schlesinger, who screened his 1969 concert atmosphere where people usually come to watch an artist perform? That question would be addressed later in the show.

ELECTRONICA

Propellerheads got to go after Holmes' unappreciated set and they blew the Palladium eight ways from Sunday. A refreshing smack to all the people criticizing the emotional emptiness of electronic music, Alex Gifford and Will White won the crowd over with their bass-heavy sound. Giving the show life and a reason for all the tweaked-out anorexic chicks in attendance to freak out, Propellerheads balanced between synthesized and live music.

Gifford played all the bass lines and White recreated the drumbeats with a live drumkit, leaving the distortion and melody bending effects to the machines. Rivaling Prodigy in spunk and energy, the band blasted away material from their latest release, "Decksandrumsandrockandroll." The mix between organic sounds and downloaded music pumped flavor into rave faves, "Spybreak" and "Clang."

Flaunting on stage, the duo knew how to incite a crowd, choosing to play the roles of outlandish rock and rollers instead of reclusive dance artists. They even jumped on the speakers. Propellerheads could've played an extra hour on just fan encouragement, but left after a painfully short 60 minutes.

Like a high that reached its pinnacle, everything fell down low with co-headliner Fatboy Slim (Norman Cook). Like Holmes, Slim spun his patented Brighton-based big beat mixes in the back of the dance floor, leaving the stage vacant. Offering a tight set that defied the Palladium's usually horrible acoustics, Slim banged out tracks from "Better Living Through Chemistry," plus a drum-crazed remix of Cornershop's "Brimful of Asha."

The audience, still feeling the effects of Propellerheads, was more responsive to Slim's musical alchemy. The majority of the house didn't realize Slim was performing until "Going Out of "'Revelations' defines that because 'Revelations' is about our humanity, not how many turns you're going to do, how high you're going to jump."

Backing this up are the three other pieces: a new production of Talley Beatty's "The Stack-Up" (an anti-drug ballet with a disco backdrop), Ulysses Dove's "Bad Blood" (an athletically sexual exploration of relationships) and the Los Angeles company premiere of George Faison's "Slaves."

Faison's ballet depicts African villages being raided and their inhabitants stowed in the holds of slave ships on their way to a grave new world.

"People keep saying, 'Oh, 'Amistad,'" Jamison notes with a bit of frustration. "I'm not on the phone with ('Amistad' producer and renown choreographer) Debbie Allen. But in reviews of the piece, it's said that this is the balletic version of it."

"Slaves" may be the Ailey Company piece easiest to link to the portion of their mission statement that promises to preserve "the uniqueness of black cultural expression." In part, the company began because, in the '50s, concert dance was virtually closed to African American performers. Though many took roles on Broadway or in clubs, Ailey, with six dancers and a square of floor space, grand jeteed through closed doors.

Yet the company's works also spotlight, among other things, a Polish choreographer, the music of Peter Gabriel and an ethnic patchwork of dancers.

"That's what's beautiful about my company," Jamison says. "You're not going to deny that somebody up there is white or Asian or whatever, but I'm hoping you get taken by the dance ... color is uninteresting. My tradition is very interesting, but my tradition includes everything, so it says African American. So here I am at UCLA and, God knows, if this doesn't have as many different people from all over the world."

The Ailey dancers have made their way around the world and into history books.

"We've been to Japan, to Israel, and I see people in the audience gasp, their eyes water, they grab their hands or bow their heads or just clap madly," says Ailey dancer Karine Plantadit-Bageot.

And while the company prides itself on being ambassadors of American culture, their status as a concert dance troupe is still a handicap to fame, at least when compared with the household-name clique that includes mostly film and pop stars. Jamison drums in the impact of seeing live recitals but doesn't shun mass media the way many more attention-laden artists are wont to do.

"The more affiliated with the media, the better," Jamison declares. "A few years ago, we did an American Express commercial that premiered during the Academy Awards and at the Super Bowl. More people saw us in that minute than saw us in the entire history of the company."

Augmenting this are the numerous outreach performances and workshops the Ailey Company conducts world wide. And in attempting to educate young audiences about their cultural history, Jamison and company add another coat of wisdom and nuance to their own knowledge.

Jamison, long ago discovered by Agnes De Mille and dubbed "the face of the Alvin Ailey Dance Theater," still watches her audience with the same intensity the passionate fluidity on stage demands from them.

"There's still this roundness, this loop that goes on between us. And it has to be going on not just here," Jamison gestures to her silver-streaked head, "but in your heart, your mind, your spirit. It has to bathe you."

And what about the next 40 years? Who is the next guest in the Ailey Company's 63-choreographer repertoire?

"I see small performances, I see big performances. That's how I get bal-

Check out -- this website... http://EARTHTRADE.COM/BOOKTRADER
• Sell used books directly to other students for more than a book store will offer.
• Buy used books directly from other students for less the bookstores price.
Example: Dick bought a used book from a bookstore for $75.00. He sold the book back for only $25.00. Beddy then bought the same used book for $75.00.
If Dick and Beddy were smart, Dick would have listed his book for sale on the BookTrader websight and Beddy would have looked for her book on the BookTrader websight. Dick could have sold his book directly to Beddy for $60.00, saving himself $35.00, and Beddy $15.00.

FESTIVAL

Academy Award-winning masterpiece "Midnight Cowboy" for the festival in the exclusive Riviera Theater. After the film, Schlesinger, in a staged interview with Champlin, discussed the benefits of being a filmmaker working during the '70s.

"Movies like 'Midnight Cowboy' can never be made today, at least not by a major studio," Schlesinger said. "We should celebrate good films, and this year there have been a lot. Movies such as 'Good Will Hunting,' 'L.A. Confidential' and 'Ice Storm' elevate the industry from all this studio garbage."

Other 1970s talents who were honored in Santa Barbara included screenwriter Robert Towne (for his screenplay of Roman Polanski's 1974 classic "Chinatown") and Julie Christie (for her acting in the 1971 Robert Altman work "McCabe and Mrs. Miller").

The festival, in addition to recognizing the work of 1970s filmmakers, included salutes to actress Jodie Foster and actor Bob Hoskins on separate occasions. Foster was presented with the Modern Master Award, followed by a screening of her Academy-Award winning performance in "Silence of the Lambs." Hoskins held a large Q&A session following a screening of his newest film, "TwentyFourSeven," which is set for release later this year.

The majority of events during the festival were not, however, ceremonies. Instead, over 80 new movies were screened for both the press and the general public. The theaters located along Santa Barbara's large commercial State Street were overflowing with excited local residents and press from all over the nation, waiting anxiously to get a sneak peak of some new films before they arrive in theaters nationwide.

Some of the more notable projects premiered at the festival were John Sayles' new movie, "Men With Guns" (the director's first film entirely in Spanish), Richard Linklater's ("Dazed and Confused" and "Slacker") nonfiction western "The Newton Boys" and "The Wonderful Ice Cream Suit." This last film is notable both for its all-star (and almost entirely Latino cast) as well as its screenwriter, science-fiction auteur Ray Bradbury.

See FESTIVAL, page 41

Bradbury himself, along with the film's stars Joe Mantegna and Clifton Gonzalez Gonzalez, appeared after the screening to discuss working on this project. All were glad that they could finally make a film that would appeal both to children and adults, and which could also find a broader audience for Latino performers.

"Working on this film has been one of the best experiences of my life," Bradbury says. "I was honored to be able to work with such a fine group of actors and make a film of such high caliber."

In addition to these major projects, the festival also featured documentaries and shorts. Michael Moore, whose first documentary "Roger & Me" won him both instant notoriety and an Academy Award, presented his latest feature "The Big One" to a sell-out crowd on Saturday night. The film mainly follows his new book "Downsize This!" and tells the unfortunate stories of people who have been subject to corporate downsizing.

Among the many shorts screened over the 10-day period in the Fiesta Theater, in the middle of the massive State Street complex, were "Hamburger Helper" from director Greg Webb and "Culture" from directors Josh Gordon and Will Speck.

> (During the 1970s) daring filmmakers ... produced vibrant, original works.

These and other short films explored such diverse topics as politics, love, war and annoying secretaries.

By the time the Festival ended late Sunday, with a screening of the Tom-Cruise-produced film about runner Steve Prefontaine, "Without Limits," hundreds of films had benefited from the exposure. For films which may never had been screened for large crowds, this was the perfect chance to gain mass appeal. As well, for other films which are likely to do quite well at the box office, the festival provided a head start for the spring season.

As the sun set on the picturesque Santa Barbara coastline, some of the event's attendees and organizers took time to reflect upon the event which had ruled the city for two weeks. Most of the event's organizers felt that this was an especially good year for filmmaking, and that this was reflected in the event.

"There are a couple of films here at the festival that have been very touching and meaningful for me," critic Champlin says. "Sometimes, the excellence of art is as moving as what exactly that art is talking about, and this was especially true of most of the films I saw here in Santa Barbara."

Students in our new School of Law will be surrounded by commitment, dedication and 137 years of university tradition.

In the heart of Southern California lies the nation's newest ABA provisionally-approved School of Law.

And, as you might expect with a new, elite program, students at Chapman have access to the best of all that's new: new technology, a new law library, and very soon, a new building in which to house it all.

As part of an established university campus, though, Chapman law students also have the benefit of being part of a century-long tradition of excellence and ethics. It's a tradition that's alive and evident in our faculty, as well as in our students.

If that's something you'd like to be a part of, call Chapman University's School of Law today. When you come to Chapman, you'll surround yourself with all the things you need to become the kind of lawyer our society needs.

organizers run the gamut of the very moving to the very amusing on nearly every subject. One alcohol awareness piece, for instance, features a lonely despondent man trapped inside a shot glass, while another work shows a flying soccer ball smashing a liquor bottle.

Worker efficiency is still an issue in these pieces. One poster, for example, shows a cigarette burning through a clock, while the legend gives statistics equating the loss of minutes to cigarette breaks to the larger loss of productivity in the gross national product.

> What might strike students ... is the presentation of AIDS.

At the same time, though, some of the posters' messages question bureaucracy, equating endless trains of paperwork with the impossibility of producing anything.

What might strike students upon viewing the collection is the presentation of AIDS in the posters as a disease transmitted only by prostitutes. This notion is an outgrowth of the government's stance on the disease, Kresin says.

"The government said that AIDS was brought to Russia by the West and transmitted to prostitutes by rich foreigners," Dubrovich says.

The exhibit, which has run for the past two weeks, will likely strike students with both the similarities and differences between their own culture and Russia's.

ART: The Russian poster exhibit is on display in the Kerckhoff Art Gallery through Friday.

My Head," with its unmistakable guitar riff loop and whining samples, filled the air. After that, things leveled off and remained cool until the Crystal Method invaded the main stage.

> The dynamic duo (Crystal Method) arranged a symphony fusing together guitar chords, breakbeats, densely layered funk and distortion into every track.

The Los Angeles-adopted Crystal Method (originally from Las Vegas) had the luxury of awesome lighting displays that diverted the audience's attention away from its set-in-stone movement. Ken Jordan and Scott Kirkland make up America's version of the Chemical Brothers. Touring for the past year in support of the debut album, "Vegas," the Crystal Method has seasoned its set with veteran-like showmanship. grandfather (Loggia). Joshua has a hard time adjusting to life without his grandpa, although his yuppie parents (Denis Leary and Dana Delaney) and nun schoolteacher (O'Donnell) tirelessly try to comfort him with the typical "you're-just-a-little-kid" answers. Unsatisfied by their well-meaning condescensions, feelings of uncertainty and loss prompt him to embark on a search for God, which takes him on an adventurous journey characterized by the wide-eyed innocence of a precocious young boy.

The movie is laced with flashback scenes between Joshua and his Grandpa that would surely touch anyone who has ever suffered the loss of a loved one in their childhood.

Each actor gives a strong, heartfelt performance, particularly Loggia, who is extremely endearing as the sweet, ailing grandpa. Cross, in his feature film debut, is cute and talented, although his acting inexperience is evident in scenes when he must show emotional extremes, such as laughing uncontrollably or crying.

Writer and director Shyamalan's loosely autobiographical work has a refreshing blend of humor and poignancy that surprisingly does not come off sappy until the very end. There are some hilarious moments in the film that are funny, not necessarily because it is comic genius, but because they capture the essence of childhood. Anyone who has been a kid (that would be almost everybody, right?) is instantly taken back to the moment they first noticed the opposite sex or the experience of knowing, or even being, the kid everyone picked on.

"Wide Awake," admittedly, is much more meaningful to those who can identify to being raised in an upper-middle class, Catholic, single-sex environment. But its beautifully entertaining story inspires even the most cynical, world-weary wretch out there. "Wide Awake" teaches you how to appreciate life, which is something to which everyone can identify.

The majority of the movie is tolerably sweet, but the end reminds you why you stay away from kids' movies. The final 15 minutes are a bit overdone and overly sentimental, and many will leave the theater puking from the fairy dust. But when the dust settles, you'll be glad that you took this much-needed break from "U.S. Marshals" and "Dark City."

"Primary Colors"
Directed by Mike Nichols
Starring John Travolta and Emma Thompson

It really is amazing that we live in a country that allows a movie like "Primary Colors" to be made. The very premise of the film, a fictionalized but all-too realistic depiction of the electoral campaign of the current U.S. president, would rule out its conception in most other nations.

While it is a testament to the First Amendment that "Primary Colors" opens Friday in a theater near you, the film itself just isn't bold enough to deliver what its first half promises. Instead of being a harsh satire of American politics and the presidential rise of Bill Clinton, it opts to play it safe as a genial comedy and, in its final half-hour, a saccharine melodrama. A film that could have been as smart and funny as "Wag the Dog" becomes as slow and mushy as "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington."

The somewhat disappointing final product really can't be blamed on any one party. The performances are all very good, the writing is clever and the direction is solid. The real difficulty arises in the film's total lack of conviction in itself and its own ideas. Whereas films like "Wag the Dog" and other political satires have real messages about the way the political game is played, "Primary Colors" just wants to have a good laugh at the president and maybe remind us of just what a great country we live in.

The movie is short on plot. (After all, everyone pretty much knows the outcome before the opening credits.) Basically, an incredibly naive and idealistic bureaucrat and campaign worker (Adrian Lester) joins the campaign of Arkansas Governor Jack Stanton (Travolta, doing an impressive Clinton impersonation). In a mad attempt to win the Democratic Primaries, Stanton and his staff face off against accusations of adultery, drug use and draft-dodging, as well as a thousand other obstacles.

Perhaps the best thing about "Primary Colors" is the hilarious performance of Billy Bob Thornton, whose turn as the back-woods, redneck, good-ol'-boy campaign advisor provides far and away the most laughs in the entire film. Thornton, who proved his acting abilities in 1996's "Sling Blade" now shows that he is capable of being extremely funny as well. Also giving a winning performance is Kathy Bates as an old friend of the Stantons enlisted to dig up dirt on any and all opponents for the Democratic nomination.

Unfortunately, these good performances are wasted in the film's final half-hour, which pulls a complete turn-around in tone and theme from the rest of the film. Whereas the first 90 minutes are witty and maybe even brutal, the film's conclusion is sappy, manipulative and smarmy. The film changes immediately from fun and enjoyable comedy into silly and condescending melodrama. A potentially engaging diatribe about politics becomes more like a "God Bless America" rally.

ed, causing isolated pockets of moshing. Everybody got up for club hit "Busy Child," the grooviest track of the night. "Busy Child" reminded everybody how dangerously innovative electronica music can be.

Yet, while Crystal Method bailed out Holmes' and Slim's attention-starved set, they couldn't capture everyone as people began to trickle out during "Busy Child." However, the boys threw it all out at the Palladium, proving wrong the notion that American electronic acts can't hang with those from England.

The Palladium gathering highlighted the positives and negatives of the scene.

The Palladium gathering highlighted the positives and negatives of the scene. While the music may be great and the ambiance may be fantastic, the scene is meant for a niche audience. But don't lose all hope in "big time" electronic acts. There is still a chance for mainstream acceptance as long as ingenious spinners and mixers like the Crystal Method and such keep on playing and believing.

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make your ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

The ASUCLA Communications board fully supports the University of California's policy on nondiscrimination. No medium shall accept advertisements which present persons of any origin, race, sex, or sexual orientation in a demeaning way or imply that they are limited to positions, capabilities, roles, or status in society. Neither the Daily Bruin nor the ASUCLA Communications Board has investigated any of the services advertised or the advertisements represented in this issue. Any person believing that an advertisement in this issue violated the Board's policy on nondiscrimination stated herein should communicate complaints in writing to the Business Manager, Daily Bruin, 118 Kerckhoff Hall, 308 Westwood Plaza, Los Angeles, CA 90024. For assistance with housing discrimination problems, call the UCLA Housing Office at (310) 825-4271 or call the Westside Fair Housing Office at (310) 475-9671. Classified ads also appear on-line at http://www.dailybruin.ucla.edu. Placement on-line is offered as a complimentary service for customers and is not guaranteed. The Daily Bruin is responsible for the first incorrect ad insertion only. Minor typographical errors are not eligible for refunds. For any refund, the Daily Bruin Classified Department must be notified of an error on the first day of publication by noon.

Spring Break.

Ah, Spring Break. Freedom, friends and frolicking in the sun. Yes, Spring Break. Time to break out, or is that Break-Up? This happy party girls' cup runneth over, but it seems as though her beau's patience is about to boil over. What's this, trouble in paradise. Sure he's probably tipped back a couple at parties past, but she's so interested in dousing her unquenchable thirst, that she doesn't even realize that she just broke wind! He could try to let her know that she's losing it (and that she might lose him), but in her current state she would probably spring forth with the reply "Give Me A Break!" This time he might just take her suggestion seriously, put a little spring in his step, and break it off for good. Hey, that's not a bad idea, a little spring cleaning. You know the fact is, most UCLA students have 4 or less drinks when they party. Some don't drink at all. Perhaps if party girl were to quaff down a bit more mountain spring water and a bit less natural ice lite draft, her spring break wouldn't end up in heart break. Got it yet? When you've done 4 you're done.

WOODEN

easier and in some ways it is difficult – so it offsets.

You are obviously one of the best college basketball coaches of all time. I'm sure that you had chances to go to the NBA, but you never did. Why not?

For a number of reasons. There's only one reason at all to go and that's money. And if you make money, by God, you're going to be unhappy. True happiness comes from things that can't be taken away from you, and all material things get away from you.

I wouldn't have liked the travelling. You're away from home, it would have been tough on family life. There are so many problems in the families of professional athletes because they're away so much. Also the coaches in the NBA, the players can get you fired.

If they don't like you, and they're a star player, they can bring about the dismissal of the coach. You're not really in control, some general managers are in control, some it's the owners, some it's both or either, and I wouldn't like that.

To say if I would like the money, yeah, I would like it. Of course. But, I turned down far far more than I ever made for pro offers – if you base your happiness on the material things, than you are going to be very disappointed.

Speaking of the NBA, three Bruins will most likely get drafted next year. If you could give them one piece of advice, what would it be?

You got me thinking. There are so many things.

Well, some of the things would be to behave yourself. I think the vast majority of professional athletes should never be married. Now I'm not going to go into telling you why they shouldn't be, but the vast majority shouldn't be. I think many get carried away with the enormous amount of money they are making now. And most of them have never had that kind of money, and suddenly to have an awful lot, they're going to have an awful lot of people taking care of it. And many of them don't want to take care of it, they just want to part with it.

It's hard to lead a normal life. There are so many temptations up there. It's hard for them to be able to resist it. You need to be strong, but still not everybody can resist it.

One of those players is Kris Johnson, the son of one of your players – Marques Johnson. What is it like to see him out there?

Well, I could name you the sons of some of my players that are doctors, attorneys, or teachers – I don't care what they are, I just want to see them do well. I don't like to base everything on professional athletics because that is temporary.

I understand the life of the average professional basketball player is four and a half years. They've got long, long years after that, and they better be thinking of that. The income they're going to make in the years they are having there. They aren't going to make that income later on.

When many think of professional basketball, they think of the Dream Team. Do you think amateurs or pros should play in the next Olympic Games?

I'm very, very unhappy with the Olympics now. I know that in some ways it was never truly amateur, but I think a concerted effort was made to make it that way. I think it should be that way. I think our amateur basketball players in the United States would still win the Olympics most of the time.

But we'd have great competition. There's not much competition in basketball now, taking all the pros. I like competition, and we'd still win it most of the times. Do you have to win it all of the time? That may be one of the things there is too much thinking about. I don't like the pros. I wish they would have kept it as amateur as possible.

Now, I know you won't tell me who the best basketball player you ever coached was, but if you could take certain aspects out of certain players to make your ideal basketball player, how would you go about doing it?

I would want one that knew why he was at UCLA – and that's to get an education. That would be number one. Education must be number one. You're here to get an education and that's going to be with you all your life and your basketball will be with you a very small number of years.

Second as a player, I want one that is very courteous and polite and well-mannered and will never do something on or off the court to bring discredit to him, to his team, to his family, to his coach, to his school.

I want one that understands that defense is what usually wins championships. I want one that plays good defense, enjoys defense and understands that is what wins championships.

I want a good offensive player too – one that could pass well, one that could shoot well, one that could rebound well. I want an unselfish player at both ends of the court.

Why not take someone like Keith Wilkes who played for the Bruins from 1972-74) and let it go at that? He's a good student, an honor student, well-mannered, courteous, excellent defense and fine offense.

Now, I'm not saying he's the best player that I ever had, but, you'd have to go a long ways to find a better player with whom to work.

The player of the year in college basketball is given the John R. Wooden Award. What does it mean to you to have the award named in your honor?

Would you pick a winner for us?

Here, I will enlighten you a little bit. When that originated, I wanted it to be a well-rounded player. On the trophy, there are five players. One is playing defense, then the other four are on offense – which I don't particularly care for.

I wanted in the very middle of that to be one player in a cap and gown. I wanted it to go to a graduating senior. I didn't want this trophy to be for the best basketball player. I wanted it to be for the best graduating basketball player, and I went along with it, and I'm sorry I did. And they know that.

But, I did get one thing in, and they haven't followed it the way I wanted them to and that is the player who receives it must be making normal progress to his college degree, whatever year he is in.

In terms of picking a winner, no, I do not know who I would choose.

Who is the best coach in the college game today?

I would never attempt to say anyone is the best. Generally speaking I would say, "I have never seen a better one," or I would say, "He's as good as anybody else," or, "he's among the best, I could go on and on."

But, there are many great coaches, and coaches are really only teachers – in places that you have never heard of. But, they're doing a better job than many of these coaches you hear about all the time.

It's just like the Thomas Graves Elegy – one verse in there says "Full many a gem of purest ray serene, the dark unfathom'd caves of ocean bear: full many a flower is born to blush unseen, and waste its sweetness on the desert air." Is the flower less beautiful because nobody sees it? Or the gem any less beautiful because it's on the bottom of the ocean and nobody sees it?

Well, now there are many coaches that way – wonderful teachers in places you have never heard of and they may be doing a better job than the more publicized coaches.

I will say without pinpointing, I have been impressed with the team play through the last number of years I have seen from Roy Williams and the University of Kansas. I think his team plays beautiful team play. I'm not saying he's the best coach at all, I just don't think I have seen anybody play better team ball.

You had so much success here, every coach from then on is kind of set up to your standard. Is it fair that they get set to that standard?

Life isn't fair. Life isn't fair in any way. The only thing that matters is to think of yourself, nothing else matters. If you let the things over which you have no control affect you, whether they are good or bad, they will affect

Words From The Heart From JAM's Israel Trip, Summer 1996

"I can't believe it's over! This trip was by far the most memorable experience of my life. Not only did I learn about Judaism but I think I know myself a bit better. Thank you so much for this amazing experience I will never forget it."
Pohen Ghasri

"Thank you for phoning me up that one day to ask me if I want to go to Israel."
Brooke Pomeranz

"Where do I begin? I don't think I could thank you enough for the great experience that you created for me. Thank you... Thank you... Thank you. I've had a great time here in Israel."
Kathy Laiczarzadeh

"I've had the time of my life. I've made new friends, seen new places, learned about my past and learned about who I am."
Brandon Edwards

"This has been such an amazing trip. I knew it would be terrific but I didn't think I would enjoy it to this degree. I learned things that I could never learn through a book."
Sharona Sabar

"I am very grateful that Julie did not stop calling me until I agreed to come to Israel with this incredible group. By some sort of wonderful chance, people were brought together and we were able to get along. We all admire you for taking 25 college students to this land."
Elise Nahum

"I want to put into words my deepest gratitude and appreciation for an incredible experience. I not only visited the land of Israel but also renewed the Jewish identity."
Nate Wycoff

"I am ready to learn and grow internally so I can reach my potential."
Debra Rudee

"This trip have changed my life forever. I have promised myself that when I return back to school at Santa Barbara, and grow older and wiser, I won't forget this experience, which has taught me an incredible amount about being Jewish, Israel, and my goals, values, and morals in life."
Niluofar Missaghi

you in only one way and that is adversity.

I used to tell my players early, "This year you are going to get praise that you don't deserve. And you're going to get praise that you deserve and you're going to be liked by everybody. You are going to get criticism at times that you deserve and criticism that you don't deserve and you won't like it in any way. But, your strength, your absolute strength as an individual is going to depend on how you react to both praise and criticism. If you take both praise and criticism with a grain of salt, it will be a great weight off your shoulders. Just make the best effort you can."

In my seven-point creed, one thing is "Take each day as it is something over which you have control." I tried to use that one – make each day your masterpiece, and I tried to get that across to the players. Do what you can, you're not doing it for somebody else. You'd like to be well thought of, of course, but to me the main thing is what you think of yourself. What others see is what you are perceived to be, you are the only one who knows what you are. Do the best you can, make mistakes, but don't make them over and over again.

Do you have any last comments to the UCLA student body?

Just to the student body, remember first of all why you're at UCLA – it is for the education and I said the same thing to my players. But support your various other activities – whether it's athletics or music or whatever.

But, whatever it is enjoy them, support them, and don't be too critical.

Criticism eats on you. Forgiveness sets you free.

est ranking in the Pac-10 conference, followed by No. 9 Arizona State.

The Bruins will see tough competition this weekend with six of the seven teams in the Pac-10 ranked in the top 25. Washington State is ranked 12th, Oregon State is 14th, Stanford is 18th and the University of Arizona is ranked 25th. In the history of the Pac-10 Championships, only two teams have won the team title.

UCLA has won the team title seven times and Oregon State has accomplished this impressive feat four times.

Since the first Pac-10 meet, the Bruins have set many records; they have the most individual event champions with 28 gymnasts, the best record for uneven bar champions at 8 and the most all-around champions with 7 gymnasts.

UCLA is tied for most victories on floor with Oregon State, both having 5 gymnasts who have won this event.

half. However, he picked up his fourth foul with 12:51 remaining and sat on the bench for most of the game. Davis played a total of 14 minutes.

"I really didn't think it was serious," Davis said. "It's not painful at all, I'm able to walk around."

To make up for Davis' absence, a lot of weight will be put on the shoulders of the other freshman starting guard, Earl Watson. After a lukewarm performance versus Miami, Watson had a solid game against Michigan. Watson had 10 points, four rebounds and two steals in the second-round game.

"I think that I got focused better, more relaxed and had fun (in the Michigan game)," Watson said. "I was really nervous (before the Miami) game. I wasn't even nervous before my first college basketball game, but the NCAA Tournament is something different. I think that the hardest game is over, the first round is the hardest, from here out it's just fun."

"I feel that (Watson) has the talent and the feel to pick up the slack for both of us, and he's been doing that a lot this year," Davis said. "When I fouled out he's been there – he pulls out a clutch performance and the type of player he is, he's going to step up."

However, Watson isn't the only freshman that the spotlight will shine a little brighter on. It will be either Rico Hines or Travis Reed who will fill Davis' spot on the starting line-up. However, UCLA head coach Steve Lavin has yet to decide which of those two it will be.

Reed was a big factor in UCLA's second-round victory over Michigan, putting forth one of his best efforts this season. The 6 foot, 6 inch freshman played 22 minutes, scored 11 points while shooting four of five from the field, and pulled down three rebounds. He also helped contain Wolverine big man Robert Traylor.

Meanwhile, Hines has been an injection of energy off the bench. Though his numbers aren't anything to be in awe of, Hines contributes with his hustle play. Many a time the 6 foot 3 inch forward has kept the ball alive for the Bruins. And on the defensive end, Hines took a critical charge as Michigan tried to climb back into the game.

"With Rico we have more quickness on our pressure, with Travis we are a little bigger in terms of size and strengths under the boards," said Lavin discussing his options.

The loss of Davis not only creates a hole in the starting line-up, but it depletes the already-shallow bench even more. And fatigue may become a major factor for the Bruins as they face a deep Kentucky team that likes to run. But despite the fact that UCLA faces tough odds against last year's national runner-up, the Bruins are optimistic about their chances.

See M. BASKETBALL, page 59

"Don't get me wrong, Baron is a tremendous loss. We're not saying that we can win it without him, that's just the mindset we have to take," Johnson said. "He's gone and we can't do anything about it. So I think once we convince ourselves that we can win it without him, we are going to win it.

"This is a business trip and the seniors have set goals. We don't want this to be our last game."

VOLLEYBALL

Featuring a lineup consisting of no seniors and no one over 6 feet 6 inches tall, Rutgers tried to overcome their lack of size and experience with energy.

However, the Bruins' tall, experienced squad quickly turned Rutgers' youthful exuberance into numerous errors. UCLA posted only nine hitting errors during the entire match while forcing 33 errors for the visiting Scarlet Raiders.

"We played pathetically," commented Scarlet Raiders coach Ron Larsen. "It might be the worst performance we've had all year. But I think that all has to do with coming in here to play UCLA, and you know UCLA has 16 national championships. It's just tough to come in here for the first time."

Led by Adam Naeve's fierce serving, the Bruins hit .394 for the match, holding the Scarlet Raiders to only .048. Naeve recorded four aces during the match with three alone coming in the first game.

"They have the leading server (Christos Tsamadias) in the nation at 0.9 of an ace per game," Seates said. "Adam is up there with 0.6 of an ace per game. Their guy was really good but he had too many serving errors to hurt us, so he probably had one or two. But I thought Adam was clearly the best server, at least tonight."

In game one, UCLA jumped out to a 6-0 lead, mainly due to the serving of Naeve. Consecutive aces by Naeve and Tom Stillwell's blocking proved to be unstoppable. Hitting errors and erratic play by the Scarlet Raiders gave the Bruins the first game 15-3.

The momentum continued for the Bruins at the start of the second game. Five hitting errors on the part of the Scarlet Raiders gave the Bruins a 5-0 lead. Strong hitting from Stillwell and Ben Moselle carried the Bruins through the rest of the game as they prevailed 15-2 in only 17 minutes.

The third game was not any different for the Bruins or the Scarlet Raiders. On the strong serving of Evan Thatcher, UCLA scored on six straight plays, racing out to an 8-0 lead. The Scarlet Raiders responded by going on several two-point runs, closing the gap to 14-6. However, despite the Rutgers squad's scrappy play, the Bruins won the match on a hitting error from Rutgers' blocker Brian Bowers.

Coming to the MUSEUM OF TOLERANCE
TO THE OTHER SHORE
The Russian Intellectuals Who Came To America
Tuesday, March 24 7:30 pm

To The Other Shore tells the story of a small but influential group of Jewish intellectuals who immigrated to the United States from the Russian Empire between 1881 and the early 1920s—the era of "mass immigration." This group of Jewish intellectuals, many of whom were raised in Orthodox homes, abandoned their Jewish identity, absorbed the radical political theories circulating in nineteenth-century Russia, and brought those theories with them to America.

they visit.

"When teams come down here, they get so pumped up playing in front of a crowd like that, that it almost always makes them play great," Wilton said. "It's just something that we expect. We expect the teams to come down here and play well."

Despite the fact that the Bruins swept the 'Bows easily in the pre-season Outrigger Hotels Invitational Finals, it may not be that easy this time around.

At the time, Hawaii was missing an integral portion of its offense. UCLA capitalized on the absence of Naveh Milo, the team's best outside hitter and passer, to serve the Rainbows off the court.

In addition, Hawaii was only playing its third match of the year, while pre-season trips gave UCLA a definite advantage.

But this weekend's matches will be a different story.

With Milo's return, the 'Bows will have steady passing and be able to run a more stable offense. The senior swing hitter also contributes 4.08 kills per game and 3.06 digs a game.

"Naveh Milo, in addition to being a great digger and a great passer also has a really good jump serve," Scates said. "He can really rip it so we have to pass his ball."

UCLA will also be looking to contain sophomore Andre Breuer. The middle blocker ranks tenth nationally in kill average (5.64 kills a game) and fifth nationally in blocking with 1.93 blocks a game.

Hawaii, on the other hand, faces a more daunting challenge. UCLA ranks among the nation's leaders in hitting with a .362 clip. The Bruins also possess an offense with a great deal of flexibility.

"Obviously they're very talented. They have size and Al does a wonderful job year in and year out," Wilton said.

"They have a lot of great players. Brandon is a great setter. Naeve and Stillwell are just a pair of really good middle blockers with size. And they're just a real sound team. Moselle has shown great utility in being a swing hitter and an opposite. They're just a solid club, no question."

that, with the same intensity. We've been rivals for the past three years but at the same time we have a lot of respect for each other."

While UCLA has two US National Team members (Simmons and Nicolle Payne), Cal has Alisa von Hartizsch as an experienced international competitor. The Golden Bears are a constant threat and Baker says they have the potential to beat the Bruins on any given day.

"We've got to play a good game," Baker said. "I anticipate it'll go right down to the end."

Sure they respect each other, but they also want to beat each other. Junior Catherine von Schwarz predicts that if her Bruin teammates and her do the job right, they can take the victory.

"Any team can play with us with high intensity but I don't think one can keep that intensity against us for the whole game," von Schwarz said. "If we come out strong like we should, then I think we can beat them."

After a good, vigorous game against Cal, they'll warm down to an easier Sunday noon game against No. 16 University of Pacific at the Men's Gym Pool. Playing against a team of lower caliber, Baker stresses that his team should not relax too much and let down on the intensity.

Added to the pressure of the back-to-back games is the upcoming finals week.

"Lets not even bring that into this," laughs team captain Payne. "Lets just say we're going try to focus on both."

These Bruins will have to perform a difficult juggling act of mind and body to make it through this weekend successfully. But then again, they've been through it before.

and sophomore Seilala Sua, hope to do well after good showings at the 1998 NCAA Indoors. Kawar and Sua threw well in the women's shot put at the most important meet of the early track season, and hope to improve upon the work ethic that earned them All-American status last year. Noble's performance in the 20-pound weight throw shows her ability to compete at the highest level in multiple events. Her success has earned her the consideration of being UCLA's most versatile thrower.

With Andrea Anderson leading the sprinters in the 200 and 400 meters, and Joanna Hayes leading the hurdle crew in the 100 and 400 meter hurdles, the Bruin women hope to repeat their team success against their opponents this weekend. UCLA defeated Berkeley and UC Irvine last season in dual competition 83-61 and 98-32, respectively.

UCLA hopes to prepare themselves for a tough schedule ahead as they will have to go to work during the spring break. After their meet this weekend at Drake Stadium, the Bruin women go on the road to the prestigious Stanford Invitational in Palo Alto. The following weekend will feature a familiar nemesis in the 1998 NCAA Indoor Track and Field team champion Texas Longhorns at the Texas Relays in Austin, Texas.

Attention: Students and Faculty in Humanities Courses!

Did you or one of your students write a terrific paper in a humanities course during spring or fall quarters of 1997 or this winter quarter? If so, please plan to submit the paper for

The Teague-Melville-Elliott and Peter Rotter Essay Prizes

recognizing superior achievement in undergraduate research scholarship in the Humanities.

Eligibility

The competition is open to ALL UCLA undergraduates who were/are enrolled in an undergraduate humanities course during either Spring Quarter 1997, Fall Quarter 1997, or Winter Quarter 1998. The submitted paper must have been written as a course assignment and must be nominated by the instructor of record, with a cover letter from the sponsoring professor highlighting the strengths of the paper. (No other application form is necessary.)

Awards

The Teague-Melville-Eliott Prize winner will receive $1065.
The Peter Rotter Essay Prize winners receive $1,000 and $500 each.

Deadline for submission of faculty nominations: Friday, March 20, 1998. But papers can be submitted at any time this quarter between now and then to 271 Kinsey Hall.

An Open Letter to Students Planning to Attend Law School from U.S.News & World Report

Dear Student:

DON'T YOU JUST HATE TO BE GRADED? Well, by their shrill protests about U.S.News & World Report law school rankings, so do most of the deans of the law schools you are considering. However, as a law school graduate with both a J.D. and a LL.M. degree, I can tell you that these same deans will subject you to rigorous grading. You will be required to endure lectures from tenured professors who have not changed their class notes since the Battle of Hastings. Then, after attending class for a full semester, you will be given one exam to determine your grade. One exam, one semester, one grade. One roll of the dice to measure your performance.

At U.S.News & World Report we are far more equitable (to use a legal term). We have a multi-faceted, multi-dimensional, sophisticated ranking system developed and evolved over many years to give you guidance on what may be one of your largest financial investments and certainly one of the most important choices for your career in law and perhaps beyond. While our law school rankings should not be the only criteria in your choice of a law school, they should certainly be an important part of the analysis.

Get your copy of U.S.News & World Report's Best Graduate Schools guide on newsstands now. Or, to make it easier for you to see the book that 164 law school deans would prefer you not see (notwithstanding their commitment to the First Amendment), call 1-800-836-6397 (ask for extension 5105) and I will arrange for a copy of the book to be sent directly to you at $1 off the newsstand price.* This will also ensure that you have a copy of these important rankings because, as a result of publicity surrounding the deans' determination to have you ignore the rankings, they are a very hot item.

These law school rankings are a small part of our philosophy of News You Can Use™: information we bring you in each issue of the magazine to help you manage your life.

Good luck in law school and good luck on making the right choice.

Kindest Regards.

Sincerely,

WATER POLO: Seemingly invincible, women spice up season with rivalry

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Staff

After warming up with a 14-3 win against the University of Massachusetts Tuesday, the No. 1 UCLA women's water polo team gets ready to heat up the Sunset Recreation Center pool as it plays its biggest rival, California, Saturday at noon.

The Bruins love to dominate, and that's what they did against the UMass Minutewomen. They provided their guests with a fast and exciting first quarter and left the Minutewomen struck and dazed, seven goals to none. After that, it was almost hopeless for the unsuspecting opponent.

Amanda Gall, who played aggressively from the start, helped set the mood of the game by scoring the first goal.

"We sometimes come out sluggish in the first quarter, which is a bad habit of ours," Gall said. "But last several games, we've been coming out hard from the beginning so we're breaking our habit and improving."

Junior Coralie Simmons was back in action after a game absence, and she made up for it with three leading goals. She showed the Minutewomen just how water polo is played when she drilled one in from a good 10 yards with an opponent guarding all over her.

Despite constant shouting of "foul her!" by the UMass head coach, the Bruins were unstoppable. Bruin defender Mandy McAloon flaunted her offensive flair by netting in two goals. Gall, Katie Tenenbaum and Erin Golaboski also chipped in two goals apiece for the Bruins.

"We have a tendency to jump on teams that haven't played teams like ours," said UCLA head coach Guy Baker. "We jumped on them early in the game, and they got adjusted to how we play. We let down a little by the end."

The Bruins may have loosened up by the end but even when given the opportunity, the Minutewomen were only good for a few minutes. By the time UMass turned it up in a fourth quarter three-goal streak, it was way too late for them to play catch-up. Losing 14-3, it was rather a gloomy trip to sunny California.

Tuesday's game provided good practice for the Bruins' Saturday matchup with Cal. Beside the usual heated rivalry, this game plays an especially important role, since Cal beat the Bruins several weeks ago at the Santa Barbara Tournament's final game (9-8). Beating the Bruins in sudden death, the Golden Bears provided a highly challenging, exciting game.

"It was probably the best game of the year in collegiate water polo so far," said UCLA assistant coach Adam Krikorian. "We're looking forward to another big game like

Gymnasts focus on staying healthy

CHAMPIONSHIPS: Second seed Bruins play host of post-season competition

By Christie DeBeau
Daily Bruin Contributor

The 1998 season has been difficult for the UCLA women's gymnastics team who have battled with injuries throughout the year. However, the Bruins (13-3) have managed to succeed despite their setbacks. UCLA is ranked sixth in the nation and will be the second seed in the NCAA Regional Competition in April.

This weekend marks the end of the regular season for the Bruins as they host the Pacific-10 Championships March 21 at 6 p.m. in Pauley Pavilion.

"I have always said the Pac-10 is nothing more than bragging rights," UCLA head coach Valorie Kondos said.

"But it is much more for us this year, we have had a lot of ups and downs, a lot of things we have had to overcome and the team has not really come together yet. I think that we need to do that at this meet for them to go into regionals and nationals feeling that confidence that they have felt the last four years."

Kondos is not necessarily looking for a win at the meet this year, rather her goal is to keep the gymnasts healthy and focused.

"We are putting everyone we got out on vault and floor, we do not have any reserves at all so we have to keep the team healthy," Kondos said." We will be competing everyone and I am sure you will see them rise to a new level at the Pac-10.

"I want to see that focus from the team. They have really shown a different focus this week in practice than they have all season. It is interesting to see them getting into this mental mode of the championship season I want to see that from every athlete on the floor at the Pac-10.

"In this sport if you are off by a sixteenth of an inch you are off the equipment so it's not a matter of we are going to go out and hit every routine, it's showing that commitment."

The Bruins have had their share of bragging rights at the Pac-10 Championships since the meet began 11 years ago. UCLA won last year's title, defeating Stanford, who placed second in the meet. Also, the Bruins enter the meet with the high-

W. TRACK: With finals on horizon, UCLA ready for tough outdoor season

By Alvin Cadman
Daily Bruin Contributor

With finals week looming in the near future and students hastily studying for exams before the much-needed spring break, the UCLA women's track and field team will host a quadrangular meet at Drake Stadium on Saturday afternoon.

After confronting challenging competition for several members at the 1998 NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships in Indianapolis last weekend, the Bruin women look forward to a successful outdoor season and an opportunity to challenge Texas and Louisiana State University for the NCAA outdoor crown.

This weekend, the Bruins host the second of four home meets on the outdoor schedule and get their first taste of Pac-10 competition this year. The California Golden Bears, along with the Fighting Falcons of Air Force and the Anteaters of UC Irvine, will make their way to Drake Stadium in hopes of breaking Coach Jeanette Bolden's unbeaten four-year dual meet mark of 35-0. This record has earned the UCLA women the honor of being the top dual meet team in the nation three years in a row.

Deana Simmons will try to repeat similar success that she had last year against Berkeley. The sophomore from Illinois jumped 19-10 1/4 last year against the Golden Bears, and earned herself a spot at No. 10 on UCLA's all-time women's best in the long jump. Simmons will also compete in the women's triple jump on Saturday.

M TRACK: Bruins heavily favored to win at home vs. Cal, Irvine, Air Force

By Donald Morrison
Daily Bruin Contributor

The UCLA men's track and field team will attempt to extend its dual-meet winning streak to 51 straight Saturday afternoon. The Bruins will host Pac-10 rival Cal, UC Irvine and the Air Force Academy at Drake Stadium.

Head coach Bob Larsen, who owns a dual-meet record of 105-2-1 over 19 years, says UCLA has developed a healthy, competitive rivalry with California.

"It's a meaningful competition," Larsen said. "Cal has always had a high-level track program. We've been successful in this series lately, but there has been several close competitions."

UCLA is expected to dominate the quad meet, with most of its top athletes competing.

The only Bruins that are listed as doubtful for Saturday's meet are Michael Granville and Mebrahtom Keflezighi.

Granville will sit out and rest a sore hamstring that is still bothering him. Keflezighi could be available for the 5,000 meters, but will likely rest his sore left leg after racing in two events at the NCAA Indoor Championships.

A slew of sprinters look to earn recognition from Cal and make names for themselves before the Pac-10 Championships.

Jim McElroy, who shredded the Golden Bear defense in football, will run both the 100 and 200-meter dashes as well as the 4 by 100-meter relay.

Bryan Harrison and Brandon Thomas will also run both the 100 and 200-meters.

Damian Allen will compete in the 4 by 100-meter relay and the 200-meters, while Akil Davis will compete in the 100-meters and the relay.

Ibrahim Hassan will run the 400 meters. Hassan, who sat out most of last year due to injury, owns a lifetime best of 45.13 seconds.

Looking to do some damage out on the field will be Josh Johnson in the javelin throw. Johnson set a lifetime best throw of 236 feet, 10 inches two weeks ago, and will try to break that mark on Saturday.

Rich Pitchford and Lester DaRaad will compete in the high jump, and Lawrence Owusu will long jump for UCLA.

Mel Moultry and Scot Slover, after competing at the NCAA Indoor meet, will triple jump and pole vault, respectively.

Luke Sullivan and Wade Tift look to post up solid marks in the hammer throw. Tift will also compete in the shot put with Travis Haynes and Sullivan will compete with Haynes in the discus.

UCLA could see football players Ed Stansbury and Tony White for the first time this season in the discus, shot put and javelin throw.

Jess Strutzel will run the 800 meters and Mark Hauser will run the 1,500 meters. Distance runners Devin Elizondo, Matt Olin and Kevin Bowes will all race the 3,000 meter steeple chase and Will Bernaldo and Dan Brecht will run the 5,000 meters.

Brian Fell and Gerimi Burleigh look to set personal bests in the 400 meter and 110 meter hurdles, respectively.

"I think overall we're the stronger team," Larsen said. "But circumstances being as they are with us resting some people and moving people around a bit, it should be a competitive meet."

Bad officials' call robs Bruins of tournament

W. BASKETBALL: Despite replays, NCAA refuses to reverse results of game

By David Arnold
Daily Bruin Contributor

They suit up in anonymous black and white stripes, they don't play a single minute for either team, and they can't be credited for any points, rebounds or assists, but game officials can win games, and lose games.

All things considered, referees Jack Riordan, Robert Strong and Lolly Saenz could have been the game's MVPs for the Crimson Tide of Alabama on Sunday.

Thus, the UCLA women's basketball team filed a protest to the NCAA about its second-round game against Alabama which the Bruins lost 75-74 under controversial circumstances.

"One of the hardest things I've had to do was go and talk to those 12 players," said UCLA head coach Kathy Olivier. She was, of course, alluding to her team, whose season ended abruptly on Sunday when the officials left the court after allowing a Alabama basket in the final 0.8 seconds of the game.

In a press conference on Monday, the UCLA Associate Athletic Director Betsy Stevenson identified three mistakes the officials made the school believes affected the outcome of the game. These include allowing Crimson Tide guard Brittany Ezell to run along the baseline to make the inbounds pass for the winning basket. Under NCAA rules this is considered travelling after a timeout and should have resulted in a turnover.

The other mistakes named were a possible delay in starting the clock after that pass, and not using the opportunity to consult video replay.

According to UCLA, the time keeper didn't start the clock when it was tipped off the fingers of Bruin guard Erica Gomez and Alabama's Dominique Canty before it was deflected to the Tide's Latoya Caudle, who made the winning shot.

> "I'm not OK with saying this team's not going to the Sweet 16."
> Kathy Olivier
> UCLA coach

After that basket the officials left the court, which meant – due to NCAA rules – that the game was over and that the score would stand. There was an opportunity to review a video replay to determine if the clock started on time, but when the officials left it was forfeited.

"I'm not OK with saying that we're not going to the Sweet 16, because this team deserves this," said Olivier.

The NCAA responded to UCLA's protest in a one-and-a-half page faxed letter which stated, "The rules of conduct prevent any governing committee from overturning the game result at this time."

Davis' season over, not UCLA's

PREVIEW: Injury forces Bruins to face Kentucky without freshman guard

By Emmanuelle Ejercito
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

Call them the Bad News Bruins.

Just when it seemed that everything that could happen did happen to the South's sixth-seeded UCLA men's basketball team, another bombshell dropped.

The Bruins (24-8) received the news on Monday that freshman starting guard Baron Davis tore the anterior cruciate ligament in his left knee during the Michigan game last Sunday. The injury will force Davis to miss the remainder of the season. Thus, when UCLA takes on Kentucky (31-4) on Friday in Florida, the Bruins will be short one of their best players, making a hard task even harder for UCLA.

However, the loss of Davis just falls in line with the melee of events that the Bruin squad has experienced over the last two years.

"I think definitely we are prepared for something like this more than other teams," senior Kris Johnson said. "I think other teams would have been devastated by this, probably would have folded. But I don't think we are. I think that we have too much pride and too many bad things have happened to us that this doesn't stick a dagger in our hearts. I think that we will bounce back from this."

Davis injured his knee when he came down awkwardly after a dunk in the first half against the Wolverines. Davis came out of the game with 10:58 left in the half. He was examined in the locker room, but would return to play with 16:38 to go in the second

INTERVIEW: Wooden speaks about his legacy, state of basketball today

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

In the second segment of a two-part series, UCLA coaching legend John Wooden talks about a variety of things – ranging from his decision to turn down the NBA, to the likelihood of some of his records being broken, to his definition of an ideal basketball player.

JAMIE SCANLON-JACOBS/Daily Bruin

Retired coach John Wooden

You accomplished a lot at UCLA – both on and off the court. What are you most proud of?

I'm most proud of the fact that almost all of my players graduated and most of them have done well in almost any profession – whether it's been medicine, law, teaching, the ministry, whatever it's been – and it's not just professional basketball.

I'm very proud of that. What they did after pro basketball is more important to me than what they did during professional basketball.

When you were at UCLA, you set some incredible records – 10 championships in 12 years, seven championships in a row, 88 straight wins, 38 straight tournament wins. Of all those records, or others which one do you think is the least likely to be broken?

Well, it's going to be very difficult for one of two – the 88-game winning streak or the seven consecutive national championships. Records are made to be broken, and if anyone said that was going to happen before it happened, you would say that would have been impossible. And it's no more impossible today than it was then in my opinion. In some ways it's

Bruins' convincing win makes Raiders turn shades of scarlet

VOLLEYBALL: Team's domination in blocking, serving put away match

By Moin Salahuddin
Daily Bruin Contributor

The height advantage and experience of the UCLA men's volleyball was too much for the Rutgers-Newark Scarlet Raiders to overcome.

The Bruins (19-2) handled the youthful, smaller Scarlet Raiders in every facet of the game, as they crushed their non-conference opponent 15-2, 15-3, 15-6 in only 68 minutes.

"Our block really worked well tonight," UCLA head coach Al Scates said. "We blocked them off the court. That's the best I've seen us block all year. We've been working hard on that lately, and we had 10.5 blocks in a very short match.

"Tom Stillwell had five, so that was really nice to see. He led the nation in blocking his freshman and sophomore year and this year his numbers have been down but technically, he played really well tonight."

The 13th-ranked Scarlet Raiders (13-6) tried to combat the Bruins' potent offense but to no avail.

PREVIEW: Huge crowds await Bruins in Hawaii for upcoming challenge

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

"It's going to be a very loud, exciting, raucous match with about 10,000 people in the stands," UCLA head coach Al Scates said.

10,000 people at a volleyball match? You've got to be kidding, unless, of course, you're talking about the Hawaii men's volleyball team.

While the rest of the campus prepares for finals, the UCLA men's volleyball team will be traveling to Honolulu, Hawaii, to take on the Rainbows in a pair of matches at Stan Sheriff Center.

The Bruins (19-2, 12-2 MPSF) will face a hostile environment since Hawaii (15-4, 10-2) averages an attendance of 6,703, but usually sells out when the Bruins come to town.

UCLA, however, is unfazed by the prospect of playing in front of such a crowd.

"Its something we're geared to because of our pre-season travel," Scates said. "I think going to Korea and playing eight matches at eight different campuses there helped us and that early season win against Pepperdine helped us too.

"What we like is big places like Hawaii; it's just like playing in Pauley."

Hawaii head coach Mike Wilton concedes that while the 'Bows have an advantage playing at home, opposing teams tend to play better when
